

PARTIES AND POLITICS AT THE MUGHAL COURT, 1707-1740

PARTIES AND POLITICS

AT THE

MUGHAL COURT

1707 - 1740

BY

SATISH CHANDRA, M.A., D.Phil.

Reader in History,
Aligarh Muslim University

DEPARTMENT OF HISTORY

Aligarh Muslim University

1959

Publication of the Department of History, No. 15

Based on a Thesis approved by the University of Allahabad for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, 1948.

First Published, 1959

Printed by Rev. Fr. H. Rosner, S.J., at the Little Flower Press, 146, Bow Bazar Street, Calcutta-12, Published by S. Nurul Hasan, Professor of History and Director of Historical Research, Aligarh Muslim University.

Dedicated with love and gratitude

To my father

Dr. (Sir) SITA RAM

DIACRITICAL MARKS

ḥ	ح
ṣ	ص
ṣ̣	ث
ṭ	ط
ẓ	ض
ẓ̣	ظ
ẓ̣̣	ذ
‘	ع
’	س

Vowels

ā long	a short
ī long	i short
ū long	u short

PREFACE

The study of the important institutions of the Medieval period has been attracting increasingly the attention of the students of Medieval Indian history. The nobility as an institution played a very important role in the growth, organization, administrative structure, social and cultural life, and ultimately, the downfall of the Mughal empire. Without a proper study of the character, organisation, composition and role of the nobility at various periods, our understanding of many aspects of the Mughal Empire, and of the forces which ultimately led to its disintegration, must remain incomplete. In the present work, an attempt has been made to study the role of the nobility in the downfall of the Mughal Empire, with special reference to the position of various ethnic and religious groups in the nobility after the death of Aurangzīb, the basis of the rise and struggle of parties at the court, and the impact on this struggle of the rise of the Marāthās, Jats and other indigenous elements, and of developments in the field of administration. The study has been terminated at 1740, as the Mughal empire no longer commanded an all-India importance after that date, and because the developments in the subsequent period do not reveal any basically new features as far as the history of the Mughal Empire is concerned.

A careful study of the political history of the period has been made by Sir William Irvine in his valuable work the Later Mughals. However, Irvine did not concern himself with the working of the institutions, or the study of the problem of the nobility during this period. A great deal of fresh material, too, has become available since the appearance of Irvine's work. The mass of the Jaipur Akhbārāt which are unusually full upto the year 1719, and the records in the Peshwa Daftar and the other Marathi records have now become available to the historian of the period. These records are of a unique type. They not only supply absolutely reliable chronology and throw fresh light on a number of important political episodes, but enable us to study in detail the shifting alliances and affiliations of individual nobles and the various political groupings of the times, and to follow many of the highly secret and confidential negotiations between them. Much of this information, by its very nature, could not be available to the chroniclers of the period. The political history of the period has been studied afresh in the light of these valuable records, since they throw considerable light on the rise of parties and their politics. A number of works, such as the letters of Qutb-ul-Mulk 'Abdullāh Khān (Bālmukand Nāmah), the Iqbāl-nāmah etc. which were not known or not available to Irvine have also been utilised for the first time. Advantage has also been taken of a number of useful monographs dealing with local history, or the lives of some of the eminent nobles of the time, e.g., Niẓām-ul-Mulk Aṣaḥ Jāh by Dr. Y. Husain, Malwa in Transition by Maharajkumar Dr. R. Sinh, Peshwa Baji Rao I and Maratha Expansion by Dr. V. G. Dighe, The First Two Nawabs of Awadh by Dr. A. L. Srivastava, etc.

My grateful thanks are due, first and foremost, to Dr. R. P. Tripathi who, as the Professor of History at the Allahabad University, inspired me to devote myself to the study of history, and without whose invaluable guidance and advice, this work could never have been completed. I am also deeply grateful to Dr. Banarsi Prasad Saksena for his kind help at various times, and to Dr. S. Nurul Hasan, Director of Historical Research, Aligarh University, who gave valuable suggestions to me in revising my work and preparing it for publication. Mr. S. H. Askari, Patna College, Bihar, was kind enough to bring to my notice some very useful material, including the rare manuscript, Bālmukand Nāmah. I am beholden to the (late) Sir Jadunath Sarkar and to Maharajkumar Dr. Raghubir Sinh for having allowed me full facilities for the use of their libraries. I am also grateful to the authorities of the Bankipur Library, Patna; the Rampur Library; the National Library and the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta; the Aligarh University Library, etc. for giving me facilities for work in their libraries.

Lastly, I must thank my younger colleagues, especially Messrs. Athar Ali, Noman Ahmad Siddiqi and Iqtidar Alam in helping me in correcting the proofs, checking-up references, and in preparing the Index. I am also thankful to my various other friends and well-wishers who have given me help, advice and suggestions at various times.

ABBREVIATIONS

Aḥkām	Aḥkām-i-‘Ālamgīrī , ed. by Sarkar.
Aḥwāl	Aḥwāl-ul-Khawāqīn by M. Qāsim Aurangābādī.
Anand	Anand Ram ‘Mukhlīṣ,’ Safarnāmah .
Āshūb	M. Bakhsh, Tārīkh-i-Shahādāt-i-Farrukh Siyar wa Julūs-i-M. Shāhī .
Bāl .	Bālmukand Nāmah .
Bayān	Bayān-i-Wāqī by ‘Abdul Karīm Kāshmīrī.
B.N.	Bahādūr Shāh Nāmah by Ni‘mat Khān ‘Ālī’ (Dānishmand Khān).
Dil .	Nuskhah-i-Dilkusha by Bhimsen.
Harcharan	Chahār Gulzār-i-Shujā’ī .
Hadīqat	Hadīqat-ul-‘Ālam by Mīr ‘Ālam.
Ījād	M. Aḥṣan Ījād, T. Farrukh Siyar .
Iqbāl	Iqbāl-nāmah , prob. Shiv Das.
Irādāt	Tazkirah or Tārīkh-i-Mubāraki .
Irvine	Later Mughals .
Jahān-Kushā	Jahān-Kushā-i-Nādirī by Mirza M. Mahdī.
J.R.	Jaipur Records .
K.K.	Khāfī Khān, Muntakhab-ul-Lubāb .
Kāmwar	Tazkirat-us-Salāṭīn-i-Chaghtā’ī by M. Hādī Kāmwar Khān.
Khujastah	Khujastah Kalām , ed. by Sahib Rai.
Khush-hāl	Nādir-uz-Zamānī .
Khazīnah	Khazīnah-i-‘Āmirah by Ghulām ‘Alī ‘Azād’.
M.A.	Ma’āṣir-i-‘Ālamgīrī by Sāqī Musta‘id Khān.
M.M.	Mirza Muḥammad, ‘Ibrat-nāmah .
Mir’āt	Mir’āt-i-Aḥmadī by M. ‘Alī Khān.
M.U.	Ma’āṣir-ul-Umarā by Shāhnawāz Khān.
Qāsim	Qāsim Lāhorī , ‘Ibratnāmah .
Riyāz	Riyāz-us-Salāṭīn by Ghulām Ḥusain.
Ruqa’āt	Ruqa’āt-i-‘Ināyat Khānī by ‘Ināyat Khān.

Raqā'im
Shiv Das
Siyar
T. Hindī
T. Muṣ
Wārid
Yahyā

Raqā'im-i-Karā'im.
Shahnāmah-i-Munawwar-Kalām.
Siyar-ul-Muta'akhhirīn by Ghulām Husain.
Tārīkh-i-Hindī by Rustam 'Alī Shāhabādī.
Tārīkh-i-Muṣaffarī by M. 'Alī Khān Ansārī.
Mir'āt-i-Wāridāt or Tārīkh-i-Muḥammad Shāhī
by M. Shafī Wārid Tehrānī.
Tazkirat-ul-Mulūk.

JOURNALS

B.I.S.M.
J.A.S.B.
J.I.H.
J.U.P.H.S.
I.C.
I.H.C.
I.H.R.C.
M.I.Q.

Bharat Itihas Sanshodhak Mandal Journal.
Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.
Journal of Indian History.
Journal of the U.P. Historical Society.
Islamic Culture.
Indian History Congress Proceedings.
Indian Historical Records Commission
Proceedings.
Medieval India Quarterly.

CONTENTS

		Page
Introduction	...	xv
i	The Dominant Classes in Medieval Indian Society
	(a) The zamindars	xvii
	(b) Assignees of land revenue-jagirdars and others	xxi
ii	The Organization, Character and Composition of the Nobility	xxv
iii	Stresses Operating on the Nobility
	(a) Political Problems	xxxiv
	(b) Crisis of the jagirdari system	xliii
Chapter I	Beginning of the Party Struggle	1-21
i	Groups at Court	1
ii	The Civil War	10
iii	Marāthā and Rajput Affairs	18
Chapter II	Conciliation or Coercion ?	22-60
i	Accession of Bahadur Shah, Appointments etc.	22
ii	The Rajput Question	29
iii	The Deccan Problem	39
iv	The Sikh uprising	49
v	Death of Mun'im Khān—
	Beginning of the struggle for Wizārat	53
vi	General Policy and Administration	55
Chapter III	Zu'lfikār Khān struggles for Wizārat	61-85
i	The Problem of Wizārat	61
ii	Zu'lfikār Khān and the League of the Three Princes	64
iii	Zu'lfikār Khān as Wazīr —his Powers and Position	67
iv	General Policy and Administration of Zu'lfikār Khān	73
v	Defeat and Downfall of Jahāndār Shah and Zu'lfikār Khān	82

		Page
Chapter IV	The Saiyid Brothers struggle for "New" Wizārat (i) ... ..	86-115
i	Antecedents and Early careers of the Saiyid Brothers ... ..	86
ii	Early Relations of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid Brothers ... ..	89
iii	Position and General Policy of the Saiyids after the Accession of Farrukh Siyar ... ..	96
iv	The First Trial of Strength—its causes and consequences ... ..	102
Chapter V	The Saiyid Brothers struggle for "New" Wizārat (ii) ... ..	116-142
i	Position of 'Abdullāh Khān ... ..	116
ii	The Recall of Jai Singh, and the outbreak of the Jat war ... ..	121
iii	Deepening of the Political Crisis at the Court ... ..	125
iv	The Saiyid—Marāthā Pact ... ..	129
v	Events leading to the Deposition of Farrukh Siyar ... ..	132
Chapter VI	The Saiyid "New" Wizārat ... ..	143-167
i	Powers and Position of the Saiyids ... ..	143
ii	Early Revolts against the Saiyids ... ..	145
iii	Political Problems of the Saiyids ... ..	147
iv	The Revolt of Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Downfall of the Saiyids ... ..	154
Chapter VII	Nizām-ul-Mulk and the End of the Struggle for Wizārat ... ..	168-184
i	The Wizārat of M. Amīn Khān ... ..	168
ii	Arrival of Nizām-ul-Mulk and his Early Difficulties ... ..	170
iii	Nizām-ul-Mulk's Scheme of Reforms, and his Departure for the Deccan ... ..	174
iv	Jat and Rajput Affairs ... ..	177
Chapter VIII	The Marāthā Advance Towards North India ... ..	185-217
i	General features 1725-31 ... ..	185
ii	The Marāthās and their Policy of Expansion ... ..	188

	Page
iii The Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk ... ..	192
iv The Marāthā advance into Malwa and Gujarat	196
v The North Indian Reaction ... ..	199
Chapter IX Conquest of Malwa and Bundelkhand (1732-42)	218-239
i The Progress of Marāthā Armies ... ..	218
ii The "Peace" and the "War" Parties at the Court
iii The Peace Negotiations of 1736 ... ..	226
iv The Marāthā Raid into the Dū'āb ... ..	230
v The Battle of Bhopal ... ..	232
vi Final Ceding of Malwa and Bundelkhand ...	238
Appendix A Was there an Imperial Campaign in 1735-36 ?	240-241
Chapter X Mughal Politics and Nādir Shāh ... ..	242-257
i The North-West and the Mughals ... ..	242
ii Racial Groups and Party Politics at the Court (1728-37) ... ..	244
iii Invasion of Nādir Shāh and the Attitude of the Nobles ... ..	247
Concluding Remarks ... ..	257
Appendix B Document Illustrating the Early Relations of the Saiyids with the Rajputs ... ..	269-270
Appendix C Documents Concerning the Relations of the Rajputs and the Marāthās ... ..	271-273
Select Bibliography ... ..	274-281
Chronology ... ..	282-289
Errata ... ..	290
Index ... ..	291-309

---

INTRODUCTION

The eighteenth century in India saw far reaching changes in political organisation, social institutions and economic life and condition. The Mughal empire which had given a sense of unity to the country for a century and a half, and led to progressive developments in many different fields, disintegrated rapidly. The Marāthā bid to establish a hegemony in the entire country failed, and the British merchant-adventurers succeeded in laying the foundations of an empire of a new type. In order to understand the historical processes which lay behind these developments, it is necessary to analyse in detail the social, economic and political forces working in the seventeenth and eighteenth century India as well as in the rest of Asia and the Western world. Till a systematic study of these aspects is made, our understanding of such important events as the disintegration of the Mughal empire, the failure of the Marāthās to establish a unified empire, and of the process of development in diverse cultural fields must remain tentative and incomplete.

The organisation of the nobility was one of the most important institutions devised by the Mughal emperors. The functioning of the administrative system, the due discharge of political and military obligations by the state, the maintenance of social standards, in fact, the existence of the Mughal empire itself depended, in a very large measure, on the proper working of this institution. The necessity of a more detailed study of the rise, organisation, internal composition and evolution of the nobility of the Mughals, and of its impact on Mughal policies and institutions has been felt increasingly by all serious students of Medieval history. In the present work, an attempt has been made to study the role of the Mughal nobility in the empire between the death of Aurangzīb and the invasion of Nādir Shāh; the position of ethnic, regional and religious groups within the nobility; the impact of these groups upon the parties and politics at the Court, and the attitude of different sections towards internal elements like the Jats and Marāthās, and external foes like Nādir Shāh. The Mughal nobility ceases to play a dominant role in shaping the politics of the country after the invasion of Nādir Shāh, rulers of 'independent' principalities and the Marāthā sardars occupying a larger part of the stage. During the period from the invasion of Nādir Shāh to the third battle of Panipat (1761), scarcely any new political issues are introduced. The advance of the Marāthās towards the heart of the empire, the Afghan invasions from the North-West, the exploitation of ethnic and group rivalries at the court by powerful individuals and their bid to seize the reins of authority at the centre—all these are the continuation, and to some extent, the repetition of the problems of the earlier period. For this reason, and due to the practical difficulty of dealing adequately with the voluminous source-material and of tracing the complex currents and cross-currents of the period in a single work, the present study has been terminated with the invasion of Nādir Shāh (1739).

The Mughal nobility in its institutionalised form was the outcome of a long process of historical evolution the roots of which may be traced back to political and economic developments in West Asia under Islam, the peculiar socio-economic condition of India which rendered a strong political authority necessary, the experience of the Turkish Sultans in India, the Turko-Mongol traditions which the Mughal rulers brought with them into the country, and, finally, the political genius of Akbar and the circumstances attending his reign. It is beyond the scope of the present work to attempt to trace even in outline this complex process of development. The nobility played an extremely important role in the establishment, expansion and consolidation of the Mughal empire during the latter half of the sixteenth and the first half of the seventeenth century. But the successful working of this institution posed a number of difficult economic and administrative problems. Apparently, no lasting solution of these could be devised, and by the end of the seventeenth century the nobility was face to face with a crisis which took the shape of an acute scarcity of jāgīrs. Basically, the crisis was born out of the inability of agricultural and industrial production to cope with the increasing requirements of the ruling class. Akbar, and later Jahāngīr and Shāh Jahān, had to face this problem. By the time Aurangzīb came to the throne, a serious situation already existed. It was further aggravated by the numerous wars of Aurangzīb—particularly in the Deccan, and the extended conflict with the Jats, Marāthās, Rājputs, Sikhs etc. Although Aurangzīb tried a number of devices to solve the political and military problems, he could not achieve any lasting success, and bequeathed to his successors a tangled and difficult situation.

In order to understand the nature of the problems facing the empire after the death of Aurangzīb, it is necessary to analyse briefly the character and composition of the ruling classes, their relations with the king and with the various social and political elements inside the country, their social and cultural outlook, and their inner tensions and problems.

I. The Dominant Classes in Medieval Indian Society.

(a) The Zamindars

In Medieval Indian society, the elements which were economically and politically dominant may be said to constitute two broad classes—one, the various Rajas and chiefs as well as hereditary “landlords”, called by early writers Rais and Thakurs, for whom the generic word “zamindar” is used in later Persian authorities; and second, the assignees of revenue called iqṭā’dārs, and later, jāgīrdārs. The common feature of both these social classes was that they lived largely by the appropriation of the social surplus produced by the peasant, though there were important differences in the mode of the appropriation of this surplus.

The position of the zamindars was, in practice if not strictly in theory, a hereditary one, and many of them had been in possession of their estates for a considerable time before the arrival of the Turks in India. For practical purposes, and in order to stabilise their position quickly, the early Turkish conquerors allowed most of them to continue in their previous situations on condition of their recognising the Turkish political authority, and paying revenue in various forms for the lands in their possession. They were also under a general obligation to render a variety of other services including military service, and aiding the local authorities whenever called upon to do so.

In spite of their willingness to “compromise” with the zamindars, the Turkish, and later the Mughal rulers, found the problem of establishing a satisfactory relationship with the zamindars or various categories one of the most difficult and complex problems they were called upon to tackle.

The zamindars were ever-willing to take advantage of the internal and external difficulties of the new rulers, or any weakness on the part of the central or local government; to withhold revenue and to encroach on land belonging to others.<sup>1</sup> Frequently, they acted as local tyrants, extorting as much as possible from the cultivators within their sphere of authority. The peasant was basically in a position of dependence upon the zamindar, and had generally to pay large levies apart from a more or less fixed share of the produce. Not only the peasant, but even the merchants passing through the territories of a zamindar were generally required to pay tolls and cesses which substantially increased the cost of the transit of goods.<sup>2</sup>

The Turkish and Mughal rulers attempted, in their own interests, to create conditions in which greater security of life and property might prevail, to stabilise and standardise currency and prices and weights and measures, to develop the means of communications, and to limit the power of the various local elements, specially the zamindars, by stringent military measures. To the extent that they were successful in doing so, the peasants and the merchants benefited. The process of political and administrative consolidation implied a diminution in the power and authority of the zamindars, although some of the measures

1 Cf. the remarks of Barani (Sir Syed's ed.) 180; also instructions to shūbahdūrs, Ā'in (N.K., 1893) i 195-6; Sarkar, Mughal Adm., 57-60, 127. The author of the Ajnāpatra, a 17th Cent. political treatise, declares: "They (the zamindars) are not inclined to live on whatever they possesses, or to act always loyally towards the King. All the time they want to acquire new possessions bit by bit and to become strong, and after becoming strong to seize (land and power) forcibly from some and to create enmities and depredations against others." (As quoted in I.H.C. Proc. V 405).

See also Āshūb 152; M.U. ii 826.

2 M. Tughlaq abolished the non-shar'ī taxes, as also the duties on foreign goods coming to India overland. (Ibn Baṭṭūṭah, Def. et Sang. ed., iii 288). Firūz takes credit for abolishing 52 illegal cesses (Futūḥ). Sher Shah, Akbar, Aurangzīb etc. repeatedly issued instructions forbidding the levying of illegal cesses, and specially road-dues (rāhdārī). This demonstrates the persistence of such dues. (See Moreland, India at the Death of Akbar, 46-50; Sarkar, Aurangzeb iii 85).

indirectly benefited them also. The attempt of the state to ascertain the real productivity of the soil, to abolish all but the "sanctioned" cesses, and the restriction of the right of coinage, etc. were resented by many of the zamindars as measures which affected their political and economic interests. The stronger zamindars also chafed at the check imposed by the state on their encroachment upon the territories of their neighbours. Hence, they attempted in various ways to slow down, and if possible, even to reverse the process of political integration. This tussle—now open, now concealed—between the zamindars and the central authority was a constant feature of Medieval Indian society, and powerfully influenced the development of many institutions. In areas such as Rajputana and Bundelkhand, tribal and clan institutions still had considerable vitality and dominated social consciousness. The zamindars and the local Rajas in these areas were leaders of their tribe or clan, and an attempt to curtail their rights and prerogatives was likely to provoke the opposition of the entire clan brotherhood. In other areas too, the zamindar was often a tribal or clan chief, and any encroachment upon his customary rights was often regarded as an encroachment upon the tribal way of life. Thus, apart from the Rājput̥s, the Jats, Gujars, Afghans etc. had also preserved their tribal institutions in a greater or lesser degree.

The struggle for land (or rather, the social surplus which it produced) was thus a cardinal feature of Medieval society, and gave rise to a multiplicity of social, economic and political problems. The Turkish and the Mughal rulers attempted to restrict the power of the zamindars in various ways. Large holdings were sought to be broken up, sometimes by interposing men of different communities in areas dominated by one community. Or, zamindars who were considered to be disaffected or disloyal were replaced.<sup>1</sup> Simultaneously, a strong machinery of government was sought to be built at the provincial, sarkar and pargana level. In Akbar's time, the highest service was thrown open to all, and even some zamindars were appointed manṣabdārs. Thus, the outlook of the zamindars was sought to be changed. Nevertheless, the zamindars as a class continued to pose a serious problem for the administration. In Central India and Rajputana, in the mountainous areas, and in the Deccan as a whole, they continued to form a very powerful and numerous group. As the Empire expanded over these areas, it had to tackle and solve the problems posed by this powerfully entrenched group: the solutions, or their absence, reacted, in turn, on other institutions and state policies.

<sup>1</sup> Thus, see Manual quoted by Sarkar, Mughal Adm., 64.

Regional and linguistic sentiments were also sometimes brought into play. Amir Khusrau had noted and commented upon the popularity of the regional languages as early as 1317 when he wrote: "There is at this time in every province a language peculiar to itself, and not borrowed from any other—Sindhi, Lahori, Kashmiri, Kubarī (Dogri of the Jammu area ?), Dhūr Samundarī (Kannarese of Mysore), Tilangi (Telugu), Gujar (Gujarati), Ma'bari (Tamil), Gauri (N. Bengal), Bengal, Awadh, and Delhi and its environs. These languages ... have from ancient times applied in every way to the common purposes of life."<sup>1</sup>

While some regional languages have not been noted, Amir Khusrau's observation draws attention to a remarkable development in early Medieval India, viz. the growth of the modern regional languages. The sentiment of regional loyalty was bound to be strengthened by this development. Many other factors contributed to the further development of this sentiment. In many of the small principalities which were set up following the break up of the Tughlaq empire, regional languages and culture found patronage.<sup>2</sup> The Bhakti movement which developed apace in various areas used the regional languages for the propagation of the new ideas, and attempted to promote social solidarity by lowering the barriers of caste, and encouraging feasts, fairs etc.

Akbar seems to have taken into account the growth of regional sentiments in drawing up his provincial boundaries. Many of the provinces coincided, broadly, with linguistic and traditional divisions,<sup>3</sup> although administrative convenience was probably the dominant

<sup>1</sup> Nuh Sipīhr (I.R.A. Series), xxxi, 178-80; Elliot iii 562.

The Ā'in (iii 45, Nawal Kishore ed.) enumerates similar divisions.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, see D.C. Sen, Hist. of Bengali Lit. 9-15, for growth of Bengali under Muslim kings of Bengal, Hist. of Marathi Lit. by R. Ranade for Marathi in Deccan states, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Jahangir noted in his Memoirs "it is agreed that the boundary of a country is the place upto which people speak the language of that country." (Tuzuk 298).

consideration. In these provinces, the local elements were, to some extent, associated with the task of administration, while some of the governors interested themselves in the promotion of local culture.

The zamindar class appears to have exercised a considerable influence on the growth of regional sentiments. The inter-play of the various factors mentioned above, and the utilization of the sentiments of regional loyalty by zamindars in some areas, created an extremely difficult situation, to cope with which the maximum of internal cohesion and elasticity of policy and approach were necessary. These, in turn, depended upon a number of factors: the capabilities of the monarch, the vigour, efficiency and morale of the nobility and the army, the continued support of the broad sections of population etc.

(b) Assignees of Land Revenue—Jāgīrdārs and Others.

Turkish rule resulted in the introduction in North India of a new social class called the iqṭā'dārs, and later, the Jāgīrdārs. The word 'nobility' is often applied to these sections, though a more correct word would be Jāgīrdārs, since the 'nobility' may also be held to include the indigenous aristocracy i.e. the zamindars, and many others such as the Shaikhzādās, or the holders of milk or in'ām or madadd-i-mu'āsh<sup>1</sup> who were not directly in the service of the King.

For the purposes of administration and revenue-collection, the Turkish conquerors parcelled out the country into tracts called iqṭā's over which they appointed iqṭā'dārs (also called muqṭi'). The iqṭā'dār was expected to collect the state dues, and to defray the sanctioned expenses including his personal expenses out of the income. The position of the jāgīrdār who came later was essentially the same. From the income of the jāgīr he was expected to maintain a fixed contingent for the service of the king, and also to meet his own expenses. However, the jāgīr was essentially the assignment of revenue, and did not primarily involve any administrative charge.

The fundamental difference between the position of a zamindar and that of a jāgīrdār thus was that the position of the latter was not a hereditary one, and the jāgīr could not devolve from father to son, though a monarch might reward good services by taking a jāgīrdār's

<sup>1</sup> See xx below.

the mountainous areas, and in the Deccan as a whole, they continued to form a very powerful and numerous group. As the Empire expanded over these areas, it had to tackle and solve the problems posed by this powerfully entrenched group: the solutions, or their absence, reacted, in turn, on other institutions and state policies.

Regional and linguistic sentiments were also sometimes brought into play. Amir Khusrau had noted and commented upon the popularity of the regional languages as early as 1317 when he wrote: "There is at this time in every province a language peculiar to itself, and not borrowed from any other—Sindhi, Lahori, Kashmiri, Kubarī (Dogri of the Jammu area ?), Dhūr Samundarī (Kannarese of Mysore), Tilangi (Telugu), Gujar (Gujarati), Ma'bari (Tamil), Gauri (N. Bengal), Bengal, Awadh, and Delhi and its environs. These languages... have from ancient times applied in every way to the common purposes of life."<sup>1</sup>

While some regional languages have not been noted, Amir Khusrau's observation draws attention to a remarkable development in early Medieval India, viz. the growth of the modern regional languages. The sentiment of regional loyalty was bound to be strengthened by this development. Many other factors contributed to the further development of this sentiment. In many of the small principalities which were set up following the break up of the Tughlaq empire, regional languages and culture found patronage.<sup>2</sup> The Bhakti movement which developed apace in various areas used the regional languages for the propagation of the new ideas, and attempted to promote social solidarity by lowering the barriers of caste, and encouraging feasts, fairs etc.

Akbar seems to have taken into account the growth of regional sentiments in drawing up his provincial boundaries. Many of the provinces coincided, broadly, with linguistic and traditional divisions,<sup>3</sup> although administrative convenience was probably the dominant

<sup>1</sup> Nuh Sipihir (I.R.A. Series), xxxi, 178-80; Elliot iii 562.

The Ā'in (iii 45, Nawal Kishore ed.) enumerates similar divisions.

<sup>2</sup> Thus, see D.C. Sen, Hist. of Bengali Lit. 9-15, for growth of Bengali under Muslim kings of Bengal, Hist. of Marathi Lit. by R. Ranade for Marathi in Deccan states, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Jahangir noted in his Memoirs "it is agreed that the boundary of a country is the place upto which people speak the language of that country." (Tuzuk 298).

consideration. In these provinces, the local elements were, to some extent, associated with the task of administration, while some of the governors interested themselves in the promotion of local culture.

The zamindar class appears to have exercised a considerable influence on the growth of regional sentiments. The inter-play of the various factors mentioned above, and the utilization of the sentiments of regional loyalty by zamindars in some areas, created an extremely difficult situation, to cope with which the maximum of internal cohesion and elasticity of policy and approach were necessary. These, in turn, depended upon a number of factors: the capabilities of the monarch, the vigour, efficiency and morale of the nobility and the army, the continued support of the broad sections of population etc.

(b) Assignees of Land Revenue—Jāgīrdārs and Others.

Turkish rule resulted in the introduction in North India of a new social class called the iqṭā'dārs, and later, the Jāgīrdārs. The word 'nobility' is often applied to these sections, though a more correct word would be Jāgīrdārs, since the 'nobility' may also be held to include the indigenous aristocracy i.e. the zamindars, and many others such as the Shaikhzādās, or the holders of milk or in'ām or madadd-i-mu'āsh<sup>1</sup> who were not directly in the service of the King.

For the purposes of administration and revenue-collection, the Turkish conquerors parcelled out the country into tracts called iqṭā's over which they appointed iqṭā'dārs (also called muqṭi'). The iqṭā'dār was expected to collect the state dues, and to defray the sanctioned expenses including his personal expenses out of the income. The position of the jāgīrdār who came later was essentially the same. From the income of the jāgīr he was expected to maintain a fixed contingent for the service of the king, and also to meet his own expenses. However, the jāgīr was essentially the assignment of revenue, and did not primarily involve any administrative charge.

The fundamental difference between the position of a zamindar and that of a jāgīrdār thus was that the position of the latter was not a hereditary one, and the jāgīr could not devolve from father to son, though a monarch might reward good services by taking a jāgīrdār's

<sup>1</sup> See xx below.

son into royal service and conferring a jāgīr upon him. But the son would be expected to justify his selection by service. A jāgīr lasted only as long as a person continued to serve the King. Moreover, it was frequently changed from one place to another in order to prevent the growth of local associations on the part of an individual holder. The grant of a jāgīr was, in fact, only a means of payment for royal service. It did not confer any rights in land or claim to a hereditary territorial position. A jāgīrdār could realise his dues directly from the peasants through village head-men, or in other ways from the zamindars.<sup>1</sup> But it should be kept in mind that a jāgīr was not necessarily an assignment on land revenue: it was any kind of fixed revenue including customs dues.

Thus, the jāgīrdārs were entirely an official class. They were dependent for their promotion and advancement, and even for their economic existence, on the will of the King. While this created more favourable conditions for the establishment of royal absolutism, such a development was not reactionary in the peculiar condition of Medieval Indian society, since it aided the process of integration which could only proceed under a powerful King.<sup>2</sup>

Apart from being instruments of political integration, the jāgīrdārs also became the instruments of a new agrarian policy which was gradually evolved by the Turkish Sultans, and further developed by Sher Shah and the Mughal Kings, as political conditions became stabilized, and as they gained experience of administrative and revenue affairs. The policy was aimed at augmenting the resources of the state by the improvement and expansion of cultivation through such measures as the provision of better facilities of irrigation, the substitution of lower grade crops by higher grade (generally cash) crops, and by a system of crop rotation. The officers were expected to take steps to bring virgin land under cultivation. Peasants were encouraged by means of remission of revenue for breaking up uncultivated soil, loans (taqāwī) were advanced for the purchase of seed-grains etc. and for restarting production—especially in the wake of natural calamities like floods, drought etc.<sup>1</sup> While none of these measures were new, their cumulative effect when applied on a large scale by an efficient and carefully supervised administrative machinery was by no means negligible. Moreover, the jāgīrdārs were made to realize that unless they developed and extended cultivation in their respective charges, they would be hard put to it to make the two ends meet, or at any rate, to live comfortably.<sup>2</sup>

1 Lands held by the jāgīrdārs and by the zamindars did not form two separate categories. See Waqā' i' Sarkār Ajmir, Aligarh Uni. Ms., 88 et passim.; Nigār Nāmāh-i-Munshī, Aligarh Uni. Ms..

2 Of. the remarks of Bernier 65. Bernier fails to understand the Medieval Indian reality, and argues that the absence of a hereditary landed aristocracy made for despotism and arbitrariness by the kings, and oppression by the jāgīrdārs who had no local interests.

Although the jāgīrdārs formed an entirely official group which was technically open to all, in practice they were an elite group strongly wedded to the principle of nobility of birth. Thus, absence of a noble lineage was considered a disqualification for royal service, and especially for high office. Extravagant respect was paid to those supposedly connected by blood to some royal family, or to some famous Sheikhs, or to the Prophet himself.

Like the zamindars, the jāgīrdārs also regarded land as the main source of wealth and power. In normal times, a jāgīr was preferred to cash stipends. Cash stipends frequently involved inordinate delays in payment, and it could be hoped that given a good jāgīr in a settled area, the actual realisation would be greater than its face value. The manoeuvring for productive and easily manageable (sair ḥāṣil) jāgīrs was one of the important pre-occupations of the nobles and their agents at the Court.

In spite of differing in many respects from the zamindars in their political and economic outlook, the jāgīrdārs could not rise above their feudal environment.<sup>3</sup> Rather, their deep-seated aspiration continued

<sup>1</sup> See specially Tripathi, Some Aspects of Muslim Adm., 277-337, for the evolution of this policy from the time of M. Tughlaq to Akbar.

Subsequent Mughal sovereigns continued to lay great stress on agricultural improvement. See Jahangir Tuzuk 7 in particular farmān of Aurangzīb to Rasikh Das Krori (translated by Sarkar, Mughal Adm., 214-224).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the controversy between Shah Jahan and Prince Aurangzīb regarding the financial demands of the latter as the Viceroy of the Deccan, and Shah Jahan's reply. (Aurangzeb, i 183-88).

<sup>3</sup> The word 'feudal' has been used in the generic sense of indicating a society dominated by landed elements, i.e. by those who derive their income primarily to be to set up as a full-fledged feudal class, and to convert their jāgīrs into hereditary estates. This aspect came to the surface in times of stress or when a weak monarch ascended the throne. Thus, the nobility played a dual or a dialectical role, being a factor of integration at one time, and of disintegration at another.

Apart from the zamindars and jāgīrdārs, there was another more or less numerous class in Medieval Indian society which also lived by appropriating the social surplus produced by the peasant. This included various village officials who were generally hereditary. These stood midway between the cultivator and the zamindar, partaking of some of the characteristics of both. Apart from these, there were various petty assignees of land-revenue such as the holders of waqf, in'ām, milk, madadd-i-mu'āsh etc. In practise though nor in theory, their positions also tended to be hereditary and they appear to have become somewhat like petty zamindars. Though not very important politically, the large body of petty assignees formed a lower stratum to the nobility, and served as a recruiting ground for the latter. It also served as a link between the ruling classes and the masses. Many of these assignees settled down in the neighbourhood of their assignments in small towns or qasbahs which became a meeting ground for the culture which the Turkish rulers brought with them, and Indian culture in its local aspect.

The power and importance of the zamindars and jāgīrdārs rested not only on the financial and military resources at their disposal, but also on the fact that there were no other social forces to challenge their from the surplus produced by the peasant. Although there are many differences between Indian and European feudalism, this feature might be considered as common to both.

Cf. Kosminski's definition of feudalism as:

- "1. A special type of landed property which was directly linked with the exercise of over-lordship over the basic producers of society, the peasants, though of course with considerable variation in the degree to which that over-lordship might be exercised.
2. A special type of class of basic producers with a special connection with the land—which remained, however, the property of the ruling class of feudal lords."

(Studies in the Agrarian Hist. of England, Oxford 1956, p. VI). See also W. C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, 337.

position. The peasantry, because of the peculiar organisation of the village economy, was immersed in narrow routine, unable to view the community as a whole and aloof from the affairs of the government. The pattern of the village economy in which local needs tended to be met by and large by local production, also limited the development of the industrial and commercial sections, and made them largely dependent on the patronage of the monarchs and the jāgīrdārs and zamīndars. Although the expansion of trade and industry following the political integration of Northern India led to the growth of the mercantile and business community—specially during the seventeenth century,<sup>1</sup> the contribution of trade and industry to the total wealth of the country could not compare favourably with land-revenue. Thus, the business community could not develop to the point where it could play a significant political role.

II. The Organisation, Character and Composition of the Nobility.

Before the time of Akbar, the nobility lacked definite organisation. During the Sultanat period, the territorial nobility or zamīndars were excluded from the list, and hence, the Hindus had little to do with the nobility. Humayun made an elaborate classification. He divided the Court into three sections, and each section into twelve grades.<sup>2</sup> In this way, a definite order of precedence was established within each section. However, it is not clear to what extent this order of precedence was actually followed and whether there were any definite privileges associated with the various grades.

While the famous manṣabdārī system which Akbar instituted was not entirely new, manṣabs having been awarded even by some of the earlier rulers, Akbar gave the system a definite order and form, and introduced a number of new elements in it. He classified the nobles

1 There is plenty of evidence about the growth of urban communities during the 16th and 17th centuries. See in particular Palsaert, Jahangir's India (Moreland), 7, 46; Fitch, The First Englishman in India (Locke), 180; Thevenot, Travels (Sen), 44-46, 96 et passim.

Cf. W. C. Smith's article "The Mughal Empire and the Middle Class" (Islamic Cul., (1944), 349-63).

2 Khwandamīr, Qūnūn-i-Humāyūnī, 132-33, Ishwari Prasad, Humayun, (1955), 53-56.

into grades depending on the number of sawārs to be maintained by them, the lowest rank being 10, and the highest 5,000. However, the manṣab soon became merely an index of rank, status and salary, unrelated to the number of sawārs to be maintained. Generally those holding the manṣab of 1000 and above were classified as amīrs, though sometimes manṣabdārs of 500 and below were also included in the category of amīrs. A number of modern writers have used the word amīr for all categories of manṣabdārs. But it seems clear that the contemporary writers generally used the word amīr only for the higher manṣabdārs, the small manṣabdārs and the zamindars being treated as separate groups.

The number of grades could be increased or varied by a process of sub-division. Thus, the upper limit was raised to 7,000 in the later years of Akbar's reign, and subsequently, ranks of even 8,000 were granted. Further sub-divisions were made by the introduction of separate zāt and sawār ranks, and by the introduction of dū-aspah sih-aspah categories, etc. The crux of the system was the fixing of a definite salary for each manṣab and for the number of sawārs. Out of this salary, the holder was required to meet his personal expenses and also to maintain a definite number of horsemen and a transport corps of camels, carts etc. The salary could be either in cash, or in the form of a jāgīr, or partly in cash and partly in jāgīr.

The introduction of the idea of definite salaries subtly changed the nature of the nobility. The nobles now came to be regarded as the paid servants of the King. Thus, a further step was taken in the bureaucratization of the nobility. However, it would be misleading to draw a parallel between the nobility of the Mughals and a modern paid bureaucracy. The emoluments enjoyed by the nobles, especially in the upper echelons, were very high. They tended to dominate not only in the political but in the economic field as well; they retained the characteristics of a ruling class while acquiring some of a civil service.

The manṣabdārī system not only established a definite order of precedence among the nobles, but led to the gradual evolution of definite conventions regarding pay, promotion, privileges etc. Offices at the Court or in the provinces often carried extra allowances, or well-recognised perquisites. Or, the King might grant additional allowances as a special mark of favour, and to meet local exigencies. Besides this, there were other honours such as titles, the use of kettle-drums and banners etc. which the king used as rewards for service and as a mark of favour. These honours were greatly valued by the nobles, and there was often a keen contest for them.

Like most ruling groups, the nobility of the Mughals was to some extent self-perpetuating, so that the son of a nobleman found it easier to enter the service of the king than an outsider. But it was not a closed corporation. The Mughal Emperors regarded nobility of birth as an important qualification, but merit and learning were even more important, and men of humble origin could and did rise to the highest offices. Even writers, professional artists, and lower administrative officials were sometimes granted manṣabs. Apart from the Rajputs, a small number of zamindars belonging to different areas such as the Bundelas, hill Rajas, Jats etc. also found admission to the ranks of the manṣabdārs. Generally speaking, all entrants, irrespective of their ancestry, had to work their way up from the lower grades, promotion depending mainly on merit. It was thus very different from a typical tribal or territorial aristocracy (i.e. the zamindars), and the hereditary feudal nobility of Medieval Europe where the son automatically succeeded the father in his titles, rank, possessions and sometimes even the office.<sup>1</sup>

The Mughals never showed much predilection for ethnic, national or clan exclusiveness. The nobility of Babar and Humayun included Īrānīs, Tūrānīs, Uzbeks and even Afghans—though the latter two were considered the chief enemies of the Mughals. Indian nobles, i.e. those who were the descendents of earlier immigrants from West and Central Asia, or were Indian converts to Islam, seem also to have found employment at the Mughal Court from the very beginning. At first, the nobles had little sense of loyalty to the Timurid dynasty, and hardly any common traditions or sense of common purpose. Some of the more ambitious among them dreamt of displacing the Timurids, and rose in rebellion. Akbar's essential humanism and generosity, high sense of purpose and personal magnetism, coupled with his unfailing success in the field of battle gradually won the devotion and loyalty of the nobility, and created a definite tradition. But Akbar was not satisfied with this. By means of the manṣabdārī system he sought to weld the various heterogeneous elements into an organised and harmonious whole, so that the nobility could become an efficient and dependable instrument of the royal will. Akbar seems to have desired that the various ethnic, national and religious groups in the nobility should be so balanced that the king did not become dependent on any one section, and enjoyed the maximum freedom of action. Akbar's alliance with the Rājput̃s was prompted in good measure by a desire on his part to counter-balance the power of a section of the old nobles in whose loyalty he did not have full confidence. However, the alliance gave the Rājput̃s opportunities for distinction and advancement which they could scarcely have secured otherwise. The alliance with the Rājput̃s was maintained and even sought to be extended by Jahangir and Shāh Jahān, and came to be regarded as one of the corner-stones of Mughal policy. The Rājput̃s had formed the ruling class of Northern India before the advent of the Turks. Apart from forming the ruling dynasties in Rajputana, large numbers of Rājput̃ zamindars were scattered all over North India. The importance of an alliance with the Rājput̃s was thus far greater than that of an adjustment with some locally influential Rajas. It constituted a long and significant step towards the evolution of a composite ruling class consisting of both Muslims and non-Muslims.

<sup>1</sup> The hereditary rajas were given a manṣab on succession to the gaḍdī. Further promotions had to be earned.

The principle of balancing the various ethnic and regional groups was also sought to be applied by Akbar to the contingents that the manṣabdārs were required to maintain. In the initial phase, the contingents of a large number of the manṣabdārs consisted of tribal levies, or their clansmen and fellow country-men. Gradually, definite rules and conventions were developed regarding the composition of a noble's contingent. While some Mughals and most Rājput̃ nobles continued to maintain contingents exclusively of Mughals or Rājput̃s, mixed contingents seem to have gradually become the usual feature.<sup>1</sup> Thus, the forces making for tribal, national and sectarian exclusiveness were dealt a blow.

The reputation of the Mughal Emperors as generous patrons of learning and administrative talent, and of their being remarkably free from narrow racial or sectarian prejudices attracted to their Court able and ambitious men from many countries. Most of these men came from the neighbouring countries of Īrān, Tūrān and Afghanistan, though a few came from more distant lands like Turkey, Egypt, Abyssinia and even Arabia. Some of the new-comers were remarkably able people, and rose to occupy the highest offices in the state. There can be little doubt that the influx of these men broadened the field from which the Mughal Emperors could choose men for the royal service. However, it would be misleading to over-emphasise the position of these new-comers in the administrative service, or to imagine that they were considered indispensable in any way. The Mughal Emperors, as has been emphasised earlier, were deeply attached to the aristocratic principle, and when a representative of some noble family of Īrān or Tūrān, or someone who had held high office in a neighbouring kingdom came to the court—sometimes in consequence of a political upheaval, or to flee from personal or sectarian persecution—they welcomed him and appointed him to a suitable manṣab. Similar consideration was extended to ancient families among Indian Muslims and Rajputs. But further promotion generally depended largely on merit, although individual connexions, intrigue, etc. inevitably played a part.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. Irvine, Army of the Indian Mughals, 206.

No systematic study has as yet been made of the position of the different ethnic, national (or regional) and religious groups in the nobility of the Mughals at various periods. Some modern writers have divided the nobility into "foreigners" and "Indians", indentifying the former with the Mughals, and the latter with the Hindustanis and the Rajputs. But such a division seems to be of doubtful validity for the seventeenth century. The word Mughal was loosely used to denote those who had recently come to the country from Īrān and Tūrān.<sup>1</sup> However, the Mughals were not the representatives of any foreign power which had its economic and political interests outside the country. Once they joined the Emperor's service, they made India their home, and hardly kept any contact with the land of their birth. One of the conditions of service was that they should bring their wives and children to the country. Since service generally lasted till death, there was no question of returning to the country of their birth after retirement. Large numbers of the so-called Īrānīs and Tūrānīs had lived in the country for one generation or more.<sup>1</sup> They were thus wholly different from the English civil servant in India. Culturally, too, the Mughal nobles did not form any distinctive group. Like the other immigrants at the Mughal court, they rapidly adopted the language and the manners and customs prevalent at the Court. They married in the country, and assimilated the culture which had been gradually developed at the Mughal Court and was widely prevalent among the upper and to some extent even among the lower classes all over Northern India, and which had also influenced many parts of South India. The policy of the Mughal Emperors was to give respect and honour to the Mughal nobles and to all deserving immigrants, but to resist their claims to a superior or dominating position. Likewise, the 'Arabs, Rūmīs, Uzbeks etc. who came to the country also rapidly assimilated the culture of the Mughal Court. However, some of the new-comers assumed at times an arrogant attitude, and adopted an air of superiority in relation to things Indian and the other sections among the nobles. The Mughal nobles prided themselves as belonging to the original home of the Emperors, and claimed by implication a special status. The 'Arabs, Rūmīs etc. also claimed a privileged status.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Mughals spoke Persian with an accent, and were also generally more fair-skinned than the Indians. For this reason, many Indians took Kashmiri wives, so that their children might pass off as Mughals. (See Bernier 3).

Cf. also the remark of Bernier (p. 212) that the Mughal umarā were "adventurers who entice one another to the Court." Bernier generally paints in an unfavourable light many of the Mughal institutions which he failed to understand. His remarks on these matters have therefore to be treated with caution.

Contemporary writers recognised the existence of numerous sub-regions in India, these being geographical and also, to some extent, cultural units. Thus, reference is made to Gujarāti, Kashmiri, Deccani and Hindustani nobles. In most of these regions, there were a number of clearly recognisable communities or clans in existence which are often mentioned as separate entities. Thus, the term Deccani included Afghans, Marāthās, Ḥabshīs, etc. living in the Deccan. The term Gujarāti included the Afghans as well as native converts living in Gujarāt.

<sup>1</sup> Thus, see Aurangzīb's remark about Īrānīs "whether born in wilāyat or in Hindustan." (Aḥkām 39).

<sup>2</sup> Cf. the remarks in Khazīnah-i-Āmirah, 186.

However, regional consciousness was not sufficiently developed to overcome the particularism of different clans, and of communal or ethnic groups. Hence, contemporary writers designate nobles by the regions from which they originally came or in which they settled down, as well as by their ethnic or clan group. Regional consciousness seems to have been more developed in some areas such as Bengal, Gujarāt and parts of the Deccan, and less developed in the North-West India. The Mughals, Afghans, (as also the Jats) etc. living in this area continued to be designated separately, while the word Hindustani tended to be used in the sense of the other Muslims settlers or converts belonging to modern U.P., Punjab and Rajasthan. But it would not be correct to imagine that these various groups had separate interests of their own or formed distinct entities, a good deal of co-mingling of blood having taken place, and many of the Mughal and Afghan immigrants having largely identified themselves with those who had lived in the country for generations or were converts.

The terms applied to the various sections in the nobility are thus somewhat misleading. One cause of the confusion of terms apparently was that the earlier tribal or clan concepts were gradually giving place to a territorial or regional (though not yet a national) concept, the process being in different stages of development in different areas.

By the second half of the 17th century, the only group among the Indian Muslims which retained the tribal-clan structure to any considerable degree were the Afghans. The abiding weakness of the Afghans was their lack of tribal unity, so that it was impossible for them to make a united stand against the highly organised armies of the Mughal Emperors. However, the Afghans continued to be a restless element which could create difficulties at the local level. They were found ever willing to throw in their lot with local rebels or to support ambitious adventurers. The policy of the Mughals was to be wary of the Afghans, but not to deny them manṣabs or employment. Large numbers of Afghans gradually found employment in the Mughal armed forces. But Afghan nobles remained few in numbers. Afghan nobles wielded considerable power at the Bijapur and Golkonda courts. With the annexation of Bijapur and Golkonda, many of these Afghans lost their pre-eminent positions, and hence, felt somewhat dissatisfied. However, there was nothing like an Afghan party at the Court.

Culturally, too, the Afghans did not form a separate group, hardly any differences remaining between them and the others on this score.

The Rajputs who formed a regional as well as a tribal-clan group had shown themselves even less capable than the Afghans of overcoming their tribal-clan disunity. Nor did they have the advantage of numbers. But their traditional position as rulers and leaders of Hindu society gave them a special status which Akbar was quick to recognize. As a special mark of confidence, the Rajputs were deputed to guard the royal haram, a position which they continued to enjoy throughout the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries. The Rajputs were also valued as doughty warriors. The actual number of Rajputs in the nobility was never large, but gifted individuals like Man Singh, Jai Singh and Jaswant Singh rose to the highest ranks, giving to the Rajputs an importance and lustre far greater than what they might have otherwise attained. The Bundelas, like the Rajputs, also were a tribal-clan cum regional group. But for various historical reasons, they could not attain a position comparable to that of the Rajputs till well into the eighteenth century.

As the Empire expanded towards the Deccan, many Marāthās also entered the royal service. The problem of assigning to the Marāthās a position which would accord with their aspirations and importance and which would not, at the same time, upset the internal balance in the nobility or unduly strain the resources of the empire, proved a difficult one, and became a factor in the organisation and growth in Mahārāshtra of a movement aimed at regional independence. There may have been some dissatisfaction in some other regions also at the status and position accorded to local elements in the nobility of the Mughals. In a big country like India, with a considerable sense of particularism in different areas, and with sub-regional languages and cultures, the existence of such sentiments would be easy to understand. Nevertheless, no strong movements aimed at regional independence developed, with the exception of Mahārāshtra and partially the Punjab, till political developments and socio-economic factors had shattered the fabric of the empire, and led individual nobles to nurse the ambition of carving out separate principalities for themselves.

Religious and sectarian differences also affected the nobles.

Thus, among the Muslims there were Shī'ahs and Sunnīs. Sectarian controversy and bitterness between the two sometimes ran fairly high. Shī'ahs were often identified with Īrānīs, there being a widespread belief that most of the Īrānī nobles were secretly Shī'ahs.<sup>1</sup> However, it is difficult to test the validity of this assumption, there being many Sunnīs among the Īrānīs also. Aurangzīb disliked Shī'ism strongly, and we are also told that for this reason he harboured a deep-seated distrust of the Īrānī nobles. However, this allegation is of doubtful validity, for Aurangzīb accorded some of the highest and most important offices to nobles of Īrānī extraction.<sup>2</sup> The Īrānīs were supposed to be very intelligent and good administrators, just as the Hindustanis were supposed to be brave to the point of foolhardiness, the Mughals firm and resilient, etc.<sup>3</sup>

Relations between the Hindu and Muslim nobles seem to have been cordial on the whole, though most of the Hindus adhered strictly to caste restrictions regarding dining and inter-marrying etc.

The nobility of the Mughals, although it suffered from a number of internal weaknesses, was on a broad view, a remarkable institution which welded into a homogenous and harmonious whole men belonging to different regions and tribes, speaking different languages and professing different religions, and with differing cultural traditions. The Mughals succeeded in imbuing the nobles with a sense of common purpose and loyalty to the reigning dynasty, and in imparting to them a distinctive cultural outlook, and in creating traditions of high efficiency and endeavour in administration. It was, thus, a definite factor in securing for a century and a half a remarkable degree of unity and good government in the country.

During the later part of the seventeenth and in the early part of the eighteenth century, stresses were placed on the nobility which,

- 1 Cf. Tavernier (ii 177): "...they (i.e. the Persians) themselves to please the King and advance their own fortunes, made no scruple about conforming themselves externally to the cult and customs of the Sunnīs." See also Aḥkām 70.
- 2 Although Aurangzīb disliked the Shī'ah tenets, and on occasions even referred to the Shī'ahs as "rāfiṣīs" and "gul-i-biyābānī", he did not apparently allow his public judgement to be clouded by these considerations. Also, see p. 9 below.
- 3 Aḥkām 8, 39, 52. For Aurangzīb's remarks regarding the Deccanis, see Aḥkām 31. Many of these opinions, it is obvious, represent the prejudices of some of the sections at the Mughal court.

combined with its internal weaknesses, led to growing factionalism in the nobility and disrupted the empire. We must now turn our attention to a rapid survey of these developments.

III Stresses Operating on the Nobility

(a) Political Problems

Among the first to come in conflict with the Mughal state during the time of Aurangzīb were the Jats who rose in rebellion near Mathura in 1669. The uprising rapidly spread to the neighbouring districts and at its height there were more than 20,000 men, mostly Jat peasants, under arms. The hastily constituted peasant levies put up a desperate resistance and won a number of initial successes against the Imperial forces. At last, Aurangzīb himself marched against the Jats at the head of a large army, and defeated them after heavy fighting. It is said that 4,000 Mughal soldiers also fell on the field. Mopping up operations continued for more than a year.<sup>1</sup>

The Jat uprising is generally ascribed to the oppression of local *faujdar*s and religious persecution. About the former there can be little doubt. The faujdar of Mathura, 'Abd-un-Nabī, amassed a fortune of 30 lakhs by illegal exactions.<sup>2</sup> The question of religious persecution is not so clear. A temple at Agra was reported destroyed in 1661-62, but the famous temple of Vishwanath built by Bir Singh Deva Bundela was not destroyed till after the uprising.<sup>3</sup>

Sporadic trouble continued. In 1686, there was a second uprising of the Jats. This time, the Jats were better organised, and it was not till 1691 that the Kachchhwāha chief, Bishan Singh, succeeded in crushing the uprising. As the Jat rebellion progressed, it became less a peasant uprising and more a movement of local chiefs against rival zamindars and for the acquisition of plunder. Although a Jat state could not be set up in the time of Aurangzīb, the growth of the power of the Jat chiefs prepared the ground for such a development later on.

The growing mood of resistance and defiance was also demonstrated by the Satnami uprising in 1672. Though described by the author of the Ma'āşir-i-Ālamgīrī as "a gang of bloody, miserable rebels, goldsmiths, carpenters, sweepers, tanners and other ignoble being",<sup>1</sup> the Satnamis were mostly peasants who formed a religious brotherhood. They did not observe distinctions of caste and rank, and followed a strict puritanical code of conduct. They made no difference between Hindu and Muslim.<sup>2</sup> Once again, local officials failed to cope with the situation. Aurangzīb marched at the head of an army, and with the help of the Rajput Rajas and local zamindars, crushed the Satnamis.

1 M.A. 92-94, Aurangzeb iii 335-36.

2 M.A. 83.

3 Aurangzeb iii 291.

The clash between Aurangzīb and the Sikhs began in 1675 with the execution of Guru Tegh Bahadur. There had been occasional conflicts between the Mughals and the Sikhs since the time of Jahangir. But these had not resulted in any definite breach between the Sikhs and the Mughals. The early relations of Aurangzīb with the Guru had been quite normal, the only distracting factor being the struggle for succession in the Guru's own family. The final cause of the rupture is not clear. According to Sikh tradition itself, it was due to the intrigues of the Guru's rival, Ram Rai, who charged him with temporal ambitions (the Guru was called "Sachcha padshah"), and the Guru's protest against the forcible conversion of Hindus in Kashmir.<sup>3</sup> But some later writers mention another cause, viz. that the Guru had allied himself with a Muslim faqīr, Hāfiz Ādam, a follower of Shaikh Aḥmad Sirhindī, and that the two were laying waste the whole province of the Punjab.<sup>4</sup>

Under the leadership of Guru Govind, the Sikh uprising developed into an attempt to set up a Sikh state in the Punjab hills. This led to a clash with the hill Rajas and provided the background for the establishment (about 1699) of the Khalsa or military brotherhood. While the Khalsa was to be an instrument of resistance to oppression of all kinds, it implied at the same time the goal of founding a state ruled over by the Guru. The step was opposed by a section of Sikhs who wished to adhere to the basically non-political and universal character of the early movement, and who also disliked the establishment of a new 1 M.A. 114-15. See also W. C. Smith's article, "Lower Class Rising in the Mughal Empire," Islamic Culture 1946, pp. 21-40. The author fails to note the role of the landed-classes in many of the uprisings, and the resulting contradictions in the movements.

2 See Tara Chand, Influence of Islam, 192-94.

3 See I. B. Bannerjee, "Evolution of the Khalsa", ii 55-62.

4 Siyar 401. See also Cunningham, History of the Sikhs, 64.

pahul or ritual by the guru which abolished caste and identified the gurudom with the Khalsa.<sup>1</sup>

By themselves, neither the Jat uprisings nor the Sikh attempt to found an independent state, were sufficiently serious to pose a real danger to the Mughal empire. But they exemplified a growing spirit of resistance and assertiveness by various sections and communities. These movements adversely affected the Imperial prestige and were apparently regarded by Aurangzīb as part and parcel of Hindu disaffection against the state, although the Rājputs and the hill Rajas of the Punjab, as also the bulk of the peasantry in the Indo-Gangetic plains, had remained aloof from them. Hence, they tended to accentuate the general spirit of animosity and discord between sections of the Hindu and Muslim communities.

The breach with the Rathor and Sishodia Rājputs following the death of Jaswant Singh in 1679 was of far greater immediate concern to Aurangzīb than either the Jat or the Sikh uprisings.

The exact motives of Aurangzīb in the dispute are not quite clear. It has been suggested that he wanted to punish the Rājputs for the support given by Jai Singh and Jaswant Singh to Dara in 1656. But such a course does not accord with Aurangzīb's treatment of these two chiefs or other supporters of Dara during the intervening years. Nor does Aurangzīb seem to have desired the annexation of Jaswant's state. A more plausible view seems to be that Aurangzīb simply desired greater control over the internal affairs of the state and, perhaps, over the Rājputs as a whole. The Emperor's march to Jodhpur seems to have been inspired by the fear of local complications by the relations of Jaswant Singh.<sup>2</sup>

A detailed critique of Aurangzīb's Rājput policy is hardly relevant to our purposes. That it was fraught with grave dangers and promised few tangible returns seems undeniable. The Rājputs had not shown themselves disloyal, and the unsympathetic treatment meted out to the descendants of an old and distinguished chief was bound to cause serious

1 Cf. I. B. Bannerji, loc. cit., ii 120-22.

2 Ishwardas (Add. 23,884, f. 75a). "At the death of the Maharaja every Rajput in Marwar out of the proud ambition of asserting his leadership got ready to create disturbance and mischief."

Also, see Note at end of Chapter.

disquiet to the others. Aurangzīb had thus embarked upon a dangerous policy, and when the Rājput chiefs defied his authority by fleeing from the court with the son of Jaswant Singh, he decided to go whole hog and to try and crush Rājput resistance to his plans. Hence, Inder Singh was deposed and Jodhpur taken under direct imperial control.<sup>1</sup> The war against the Rathors soon expanded into a war against the Sishodias of Mewar also.

Although an agreement with the Sishodias was patched up in 1680 and, at the same time, the promise of restoring Ajit Singh to mansab and raj when he came of age reiterated,<sup>2</sup> hostilities with the Rathors continued. In 1698, an agreement was concluded with Ajit Singh restoring him to the gaddi, but Jodhpur city remained under the control of the Imperialists as a guarantee of good behaviour on his part. This did not satisfy Ajit Singh who did not adhere to the treaty and kept Rajputana in a disturbed condition.

The Rathor uprising should not be regarded as constituting a breach between the Mughal Emperor and the Rājputs as such, for the Kachchhwāhas, Hārās etc. continued to serve the Mughal empire. Nor was the material damage to the Mughal empire very large. Its importance lay rather in as much as it constituted a definite set-back to the attempt to establish a composite ruling class consisting of various elements among the Muslims and the Hindus in the country. It thus strengthened the forces of separatism among the Hindus and the Muslims. In the second place, the absence of a powerful Rājput section in the nobility ultimately made negotiations with the Marāthās more difficult. It also led to the diversion of resources at a critical time and emboldened others like the Jats and Sikhs to continue to defy Mughal authority.<sup>3</sup>

The power and influence of the Marāthās had steadily grown in the politics of the Deccan states during the seventeenth century, and already in the time of Shah Jahan, Shahji Bhonsle had carved out a semi-independent principality for himself, first around Poona, and then

1 M.A. 179, Dil. 165.

2 Aurangzeb V 269.

3 The Bundela conflict was very largely a struggle between rival claimants to the gaddi of Orchha, and never assumed the dimensions of a popular struggle even to the extent the Rajput uprising did.

at Bangalore. The early efforts of Shivaji, the son of a neglected wife of Shahji, were directed towards recovering his father's jāgīr in Poona. His growing ambitions, and the manifest inability of the Bijapur government to curb his activities, brought him into clash with the Mughals who were reluctant to see a new state arise on their southern border and were suspicious of the plundering proclivities of Shivaji. A tussle with the mighty Mughal empire faced Shivaji with a difficult choice—whether to strike out for independence or to come to terms with it. In 1665, when Jai Singh hemmed in Shivaji at Purandar and occupied most of his forts, Shivaji agreed to a treaty by which out of the 35 forts then in his possession yielding an annual income of 5 lakh huns in the former Nizamshahi kingdom, he was to be left with 12 forts yielding one lakh huns, (i.e. five lakh rupees), and was allotted tāluqs yielding nine lakhs of huns—4 lakhs in the Bijapuri Tal-Konkan and 5 lakhs in Balaghat. The latter was in anticipation of a joint campaign against Bijapur. In return for these, Shivaji was to pay 40 lakh huns in instalments of 3 lakhs each year, be loyal and obedient to the Mughal government, refrain from plundering the imperial dominions, and perform service in the Deccan whenever called upon to do so. His son, Shambhaji, was accorded the manṣab of 5,000, and accompanied by Netaji, the trusted lieutenant of Shivaji, was to attend on the ṣūbahdār of the Deccan.<sup>1</sup>

Thus, Shivaji was given autonomy within an area which, if the Bijapur campaign proved successful, would actually yield him an income greater than what he had enjoyed before. He was also exempted from personal service (except in the Deccan)—a privilege extended only to the Rana of Mewar, the most illustrious and the oldest ruling house in Rajputana. The manṣab granted to Shivaji's son was also not a low one, being equal to that held by the Rana of Mewar. But it was not likely to satisfy Shivaji since similar ranks had already been granted to a number of Marāthā chiefs regarded by Shivaji as inferior to him in status and power.<sup>2</sup>

The treaty of Purandar might have formed the basis of a lasting settlement between the Mughals and Shivaji. But the failure of Jai

1 Sarkar, House of Shivaji, 117-18.

2 Ibid. 113. In 1630, when Shahji had joined the Mughals, he had also been granted the rank of 5,000. (Lahori, Pādshāhnāmāh, i 328).

Singh's campaign against Bijapur completely changed the situation. Shivaji was left with an income of only one lakh huns, and for the realisation of even this he had to reckon with the hostility of Bijapur. It was obvious that the Marāthā alliance could only be preserved if Aurangzīb relinquished hold of most of Shivaji's forts, or compensated him somewhere else.

No fresh approach was made by Aurangzīb to Shivaji between 1666 and 1675. In 1675, Bahādur Khān, the Viceroy of the Deccan, offered a rank of 6,000 to Shambhaji, the son of Shivaji, and asked Shivaji to surrender 17 forts only as against the 23 secured by Jai Singh.<sup>1</sup> Evidently, the Mughals still regarded the treaty of Purandar as the basis for negotiations with Shivaji. But Shivaji's power and aspirations had grown considerably in the meantime, and he was in no mood to accept such trifling concessions which showed the small value attached by the Mughals to a Marāthā alliance.

Meanwhile, a fresh source of friction between the Mughals and the Marāthās made its appearance. This was Shivaji's practice of levying chauth and sardeshmukhi from Mughal territories. Though chauth and sardeshmukhi were traditional imposts, Shivaji was probably the first leader of consequence to use them systematically as a means of gathering the sinews of war against his enemies. Chauth did not, at first, imply any claim to a privileged political position in the Deccan, but was in the nature of a war-tax. It constituted, however, a challenge to the Mughal capacity to safeguard their territories from external plunder, and thus compromised their sovereignty. At the same time, the manner of enforcing the claim was a menace to the trade and industry of the entire area, and threatened to disrupt the vital link between the rich and industrious West coast and the populous centres of North India. The claim for sardeshmukhi rested on the legal fiction that Shivaji was the chief Deshmukh of the Deccan. It was enforced in the same manner as the claim for chauth.<sup>2</sup>

Thus, the main differences between Shivaji and the Mughals centred

1 Aurangzeb V 222-23.

2 For the controversy regarding the nature and origin of chauth and sardeshmukhi, see Ranade, Rise of the Maratha Power, 219-38; Sen, Maratha Adm., 97-99; Sardesai, New Hist., ii 51-52; Balkrishna, Nature of Sardeshmukhi, I.H.C. 1939, 1189-93.

around the territory and manṣab which was to be granted to Shivaji, and later, around the claim for chauth and sardeshmukhi. For strategic and economic reasons, the Mughals were unwilling to see a powerful Marāthā state arise on their southern border, on the flank of the vital trade route to the west coast. Financial stringency made it impossible to satisfy the ambitions of Shivaji except at the expense of the Deccan states. But for a variety of reasons, Aurangzīb was not prepared or unable to make a concerted move against the Deccan states till 1676. By the time, Shivaji's ambitions had soared higher, and he had become convinced of the advantages of playing a lone hand rather than of serving the Mughals. Personal factors also played a part. Aurangzīb had a deep-seated distrust of Shivaji which the various 'exploits' of the latter had done nothing to allay. He failed, at the same time, to understand the nature of the forces represented by Shivaji, and hence, grossly under-estimated the real power of the Marāthās, and the worth of an alliance with them for the rapid conquest and consolidation of the Deccan.

Aurangzīb went to the Deccan in 1681, ostensibly in pursuit of Prince Akbar. But the threat from the side of the Prince soon passed, and the Emperor's main pre-occupation became the conquest of Bijapur and Golkonda. There is insufficient evidence to support the view that Aurangzīb determined, at this stage, upon the total destruction of the Marāthā state. The capture of Shambhaji was an unexpected piece of good luck for Aurangzīb. Although Shambhaji was treated as a rebel for the sin of helping Prince Akbar, and was executed, the treatment accorded to Shambha's son, Shahu, suggests that Aurangzīb contemplated the recognition of his title to Shivaji's gaddi when he came of age. Shahu was granted the manṣab of 7,000 which had also been conferred on Shambhaji in 1678, accorded the title of Raja, and lodged inside the gulāl-bār, and not inside forfress-prisons like the deposed rulers of Bijapur and Golkonda. Decent allowances were fixed upon him, and when he was 12 years old, Aurangzīb married him to two girls of respectable Marāthā families, and presented him with the sword of Shivaji which had been captured with Shambhaji in 1689.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Raḡū'im 23b, M.A. 332, 433, 482. Cf. Sardesai, New Hist., i 331.

The gulāl-bār was a large enclosure near the special apartments of the Emperor, the doors of which were made very strong, and secured with locks and keys. (See Ā'in i 27).

Between 1689 and 1698, Aurangzīb concentrated his efforts upon taking possession of the rich and fertile tract extending upto Jinji. He was apparently convinced that once the Mughal hold on this area had been effectively established, the Marāthās would either come to their senses and accept his terms, or they would be surrounded and crushed.

With Mughal territory extended upto the Karnatak, Rajaram bottled up in Jinji, and the Marāthā state shattered, the situation seemed to be over-whelmingly in favour of Aurangzīb. But Aurangzīb had not reckoned with the national spirit of the Marāthās which now came into play. The Marāthā resistance revived from about 1695, and after Rajaram's return from Jinji in 1698, the Mughals had to suffer a number of reverses. Rajaram parcelled out the Mughal territories among Marāthā sardars, and asked them to levy their own contributions. The extended communications of the Mughals were highly vulnerable to the quick-moving Marāthā bands. The local officials often deemed it more profitable to make private deals with the Marāthās than to offer them serious resistance.<sup>1</sup> To cope with this situation, Aurangzīb constituted powerful cavalry units supported by artillery under Zu'lfikār Khān, Chīn Qulīch Khān, and others. But the heavier armaments, lack of local support, and ignorance of local topography made the Mughals often helpless against the Marāthās in a war of movement. In desperation, Aurangzīb entered upon the futile expedient of trying to conquer the various Marāthā forts one by one. But the situation was now vastly different from 1664, and Jai Singh's success against Shivaji could not be repeated. The only alternative before Aurangzīb was to attempt negotiations.

Meanwhile, the war had inflicted extensive damage upon the Marāthās too, and in 1695 and 1698, they had attempted to open negotiations with the Mughals, but in vain.<sup>2</sup>

In 1700, on the death of Rajaram, his widow, Tara Bai, proposed peace to Aurangzīb, offering to maintain a contingent of 5,000 troops for Imperial service, and to cede 7 forts in return for the recognition of her son, Shivaji II, as the King of the Marāthās, the grant to him of the rank of 7,000, and the right of collecting sardeshmukhi in the Deccan. Thus, Tara Bai dropped the claim for independence as also around the territory and manṣab which was to be granted to Shivaji, and later, around the claim for chauth and sardeshmukhi. For strategic and economic reasons, the Mughals were unwilling to see a powerful Marāthā state arise on their southern border, on the flank of the vital trade route to the west coast. Financial stringency made it impossible to satisfy the ambitions of Shivaji except at the expense of the Deccan states. But for a variety of reasons, Aurangzīb was not prepared or unable to make a concerted move against the Deccan states till 1676. By the time, Shivaji's ambitions had soared higher, and he had become convinced of the advantages of playing a lone hand rather than of serving the Mughals. Personal factors also played a part. Aurangzīb had a deep-seated distrust of Shivaji which the various 'exploits' of the latter had done nothing to allay. He failed, at the same time, to understand the nature of the forces represented by Shivaji, and hence, grossly under-estimated the real power of the Marāthās, and the worth of an alliance with them for the rapid conquest and consolidation of the Deccan.

<sup>1</sup> See Dil. 140a-b.

<sup>2</sup> Dil. 122a-b, Aurangzeb V 105, 131.

Aurangzīb went to the Deccan in 1681, ostensibly in pursuit of Prince Akbar. But the threat from the side of the Prince soon passed, and the Emperor's main pre-occupation became the conquest of Bijapur and Golkonda. There is insufficient evidence to support the view that Aurangzīb determined, at this stage, upon the total destruction of the Marāthā state. The capture of Shambhaji was an unexpected piece of good luck for Aurangzīb. Although Shambhaji was treated as a rebel for the sin of helping Prince Akbar, and was executed, the treatment accorded to Shambha's son, Shahu, suggests that Aurangzīb contemplated the recognition of his title to Shivaji's gaddi when he came of age. Shahu was granted the manṣab of 7,000 which had also been conferred on Shambhaji in 1678, accorded the title of Raja, and lodged inside the gulāl-bār, and not inside forfress-prisons like the deposed rulers of Bijapur and Golkonda. Decent allowances were fixed upon him, and when he was 12 years old, Aurangzīb married him to two girls of respectable Marāthā families, and presented him with the sword of Shivaji which had been captured with Shambhaji in 1689.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Raḡwīm 23b, M.A. 332, 433, 482. Cf. Sardesai, New Hist., i 331.

The gulāl-bār was a large enclosure near the special apartments of the Emperor, the doors of which were made very strong, and secured with locks and keys. (See Ā'in i 27).

Between 1689 and 1698, Aurangzīb concentrated his efforts upon taking possession of the rich and fertile tract extending upto Jinji. He was apparently convinced that once the Mughal hold on this area had been effectively established, the Marāthās would either come to their senses and accept his terms, or they would be surrounded and crushed.

With Mughal territory extended upto the Karnatak, Rajaram bottled up in Jinji, and the Marāthā state shattered, the situation seemed to be over-whelmingly in favour of Aurangzīb. But Aurangzīb had not reckoned with the national spirit of the Marāthās which now came into play. The Marāthā resistance revived from about 1695, and after Rajaram's return from Jinji in 1698, the Mughals had to suffer a number of reverses. Rajaram parcelled out the Mughal territories among Marāthā sardars, and asked them to levy their own contributions. The extended communications of the Mughals were highly vulnerable to the quick-moving Marāthā bands. The local officials often deemed it more profitable to make private deals with the Marāthās than to offer them serious resistance.<sup>1</sup> To cope with this situation, Aurangzīb constituted powerful cavalry units supported by artillery under Zū'lfīqār Khān, Chīn Qulīch Khān, and others. But the heavier armaments, lack of local support, and ignorance of local topography made the Mughals often helpless against the Marāthās in a war of movement. In desperation, Aurangzīb entered upon the futile expedient of trying to conquer the various Marāthā forts one by one. But the situation was now vastly different from 1664, and Jai Singh's success against Shivaji could not be repeated. The only alternative before Aurangzīb was to attempt negotiations.

Meanwhile, the war had inflicted extensive damage upon the Marāthās too, and in 1695 and 1698, they had attempted to open negotiations with the Mughals, but in vain.<sup>2</sup>

In 1700, on the death of Rajaram, his widow, Tara Bai, proposed peace to Aurangzīb, offering to maintain a contingent of 5,000 troops for Imperial service, and to cede 7 forts in return for the recognition of her son, Shivaji II, as the King of the Marāthās, the grant to him of the rank of 7,000, and the right of collecting sardeshmukhi in the Deccan. Thus, Tara Bai dropped the claim for independence as also for chauth. We are told that Aurangzīb rejected these terms, demanding the ceding of all forts.<sup>1</sup> The motives of Aurangzīb can only be guessed. He may have felt some hesitation in bye-passing the claims of Shahu, or he may have seen in these terms a sign of weakness, and believed that the Marāthās would come round completely to his point of view if he showed patience and firmness a little longer.

<sup>1</sup> See Dil. 140a-b.

<sup>2</sup> Dil. 122a-b, Aurangzeb V 105, 131.

In 1703, negotiations were opened with Dhānā Jādav through Prince Kām Bakhsh for the release of Shahu "on certain terms". Shahu was transferred to Kām Bakhsh's camp, and invitations were drawn up for no less than 70 Marāthā sardars to come and see him after which they were to be conducted to the Imperial presence, and admitted into Imperial service. In other words, Aurangzīb wanted the Marāthā sardars to tender allegiance and accept Shahu as their ruler. What concessions he offered in return is not known. According to some later historians, he was prepared to grant sardeshmukhi over the six ṣūbahs of the Deccan, in addition, apparently, to the swarajya of Shivaji, i.e., the territories which Shivaji controlled at the time of his death. We are told that the documents granting sardeshmukhi were actually drawn up and handed over to Aḥsan Khān to be delivered to the Marāthās. But "the plan did not please Aurangzīb who prudently felt misgivings as to the craftiness of the Marāthās and was apprehensive that if they assembled forty or fifty thousand horse near the royal camp, they might by pretence carry off Raja Shahu and Prince Kām Bakhsh to their hills of difficult access."<sup>2</sup> Hence, the negotiations were broken off.

<sup>1</sup> Aurangzeb V 136, Akḥbārāt March 12, 1700.

K.K. (ii 626, 782) states that Tara Bai asked for 9% as sardeshmukhi, but "for the honour of Islam and other reasons, Aurangzīb rejected the proposal." This event is placed "towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign", but presumably refers to the negotiations of 1700.

<sup>2</sup> K.K. 520, M.A. 473. T. Ibrūhim Khān (Rampur Ms., Elliot viii 259), states: "Towards the close of His Majesty's life time, a truce was concluded with the Marāthās on these terms, viz. that 9% (Elliot says 3%, but the original reads—"har sad az maḥṣūl-i-mulkī nah rupiah") of the revenues drawn from the Imperial dominions in the Dakḥin should be allotted to them by way of sardeshmukhi; and accordingly Aḥsan Khān commonly known as Mīr Malik set out from the threshold of royalty with the documents confirming this grant to the Marāthās in order that after the treaty had

[continued]

A final effort for peace, in 1706, through the mediation of Zū'lfīqār Khān was equally fruitless.<sup>1</sup>

The rise in Mahārāshtra of a powerful movement aimed at regional independence created for the Mughals a problem which was not purely regional in its implications. A successful defiance of the Mughal authority by the Marāthās not only militated against the principle of all-India Timurid monarchy, but might well upset the delicate alliance of the Muslims and the Hindus in the nobility. On the other hand, it was difficult to adjust the ambitions of the various Marāthā sardars in the existing framework of the nobility, particularly as the jāgīrdārī system on which the institution of the nobility rested was already in a state of deep crisis.

(b) Crisis of the Jāgīrdārī System.

The political problems of Aurangzīb were accompanied by a deepening crisis of the jāgīrdārī system which accentuated and, in turn, was accentuated by the political crisis.

The Mughals evolved a number of administrative devices to ensure been duly ratified, he might bring the chiefs of that tribe to the court of the Monarch of the World. However, before he had time to deliver these documents in their custody a royal mandate was issued, directing him to return and bring back the papers in question with him."

Ibrāhīm Khān is supported by the Khazīnah-i-'Amīrah (p. 41) which says 9% was agreed to. Khāfī Khān (p. 520), though in agreement with Ibrāhīm Khān with regard to the events, does not make any mention of the grant of sardeshmukhi by Aurangzīb.

Duff (i 445), followed by Ranade (p. 226), says that Aurangzīb was, for a time, prepared to grant ten per cent as sardeshmukhi. The event is, however, wrongly placed in 1705, and no authority is cited.

Manucci (iii 498-99) states that Aurangzīb tried to sow dissension among the Marathas by releasing Shahu, granting him chauth (of the Deccan) and leaving Kam Bakhsh as the governor of Bijapur, Golkonda and the two Carnatics and himself retiring to Delhi.

No Persian or Marathi authority supports Manucci who, in general, is a very unreliable authority, especially where political affairs are concerned. K. & Parasnis (ii 111-2), and S. G. Sardesai (New History, 356) assert that "towards the end of his life Aurangzīb had consented to grant to the Maratha Government Chauth and Sardeshmukhi and the restoration of Shivaji's Kingdom (Swarajya)". This view is apparently based on Manucci and, as such, is untenable.

<sup>1</sup> Dil. ff. 154b, 155a, M.A. 511.

the proper functioning of the manṣabdārī system. These administrative devices, while valuable in themselves, could not, however, help them to overcome the basic problem, viz. that the available social surplus was insufficient to defray the cost of administration, pay for wars of one type or another, and to give the ruling class a standard of life in keeping with its expectations. It would appear that in India as in a number of Western countries during this period, there was a decline in the value of money.<sup>1</sup> Among other things, it led to a rise in the cost of administration. Simultaneously, the expectations and the cost of living of the ruling class tended to rise. The Mughal monarchs themselves set the pace by incurring large expenditure on all kinds of pomp and show, as well as on the patronage of the various arts and crafts. While this gave employment to large numbers of artists and artisans, and stimulated some types of industry and trade, it did not solve the basic difficulty which remained one of agricultural production. Then as now agricultural production formed the backbone of the Indian economy, and, ultimately, a stable growth of income could only be based on a rise in the value and volume of agricultural production. A rise in the requirements of the ruling class without a corresponding rise in agricultural production resulted directly or indirectly in the growth of economic pressure on the producing classes. As has been mentioned earlier, the Mughal Emperors laid great emphasis on the promotion of agriculture. Expansion of agriculture, as well as the improvement of irrigation facilities, the introduction of high grade crops, provision of seeds, taqavi in times of distress, etc. formed an important branch of state activity, and officials were instructed to exhort, and if

1 According to Hodiwala (Historical Studies in Mughal Numismatics, 245-52), the gold muhar appreciated considerably in terms of the rupee between the time the Ā'in was composed and the end of the 17th century.

The decline in the purchasing power of the rupee is also reflected in the rise in the price of food-grains and ghee. [Cf. M.A., 98, for prices at Agra in 1670 when harvest had been exceptionally favourable, with those in the Ā'in (N.K., i 38 et seq.)]. Allowing for the difference in the weight of the man, the prices of wheat, gram, and ghee in 1670 were 2½ to 3 times higher than at the beginning of the century. The rise in the price of sugar and indigo was even greater, as indicated by the prices given in the English Factory Records.

necessary to compel the individual peasants to cultivate as much land as possible. While there is evidence of a continual expansion of the cultivated area during the seventeenth century, signs of a crisis of the jāgīrdārī system became visible during the latter years of Jahangir's reign. Zāt and sawār ranks had long ceased to indicate the total number of horsemen or horses actually maintained. Shah Jahan re-fixed the salaries and made it a rule that not more than one-third of the number indicated by the sawār rank was to be actually maintained by a noble: generally, the contingent was less than even one-third. Salaries were scaled down proportionately by the practice of paying salaries for only 10, 8, 6 or even 4 months in the year. The majority of nobles apparently received salaries for six to eight months only.<sup>1</sup> Thus, appearances were preserved, while reality was sought to be faced by spreading the available resources more widely. But Shāh Jahān's reforms should not be understood to imply any reduction in the nett salaries of the nobles after setting off the cost of the maintenance of the troopers. Rather, in actual practice the nett incomes were perhaps higher. Shāh Jahān's court was reputed to be the most splendid in the world and many nobles accumulated vast fortunes.

The reforms of Shāh Jahān mitigated but could not solve the financial crisis. Resources could not keep pace with growing expenses, and when at the end of the thirteenth year of his reign, Aurangzīb reviewed the position, he was faced with a revenue-deficit.<sup>2</sup> Despite economies in expenditure, emphasis on simplicity, the imposition of fresh taxes, and constant injunctions to his nobles to extend and improve cultivation,<sup>3</sup> Aurangzīb failed to solve the financial crisis.

Struggle for jāgīrs and employment at the court tended to re-inforce the latent spirit of racial and religious exclusiveness, and to the raising of slogans for the exclusion of the Hindus from the nobility.<sup>4</sup> At the same time, the pressure for solving the internal crisis at the expense of the Deccan states grew. But much of the Deccan was itself a deficit area. In any case, misgovernment and internecine warfare among factions and groups had reduced it to a state where no quick yields could be expected. There was the further problem of satisfying local aspirants, and of finding the basis for a satisfactory settlement with the Marāthās.

<sup>1</sup> See Aziz, Mansabdarī System, 52-3.

<sup>2</sup> M.A. 99-100.

<sup>3</sup> Thus, see Aurangzīb's farmān to Muhammad Hashim, Diwan of Gujarat (Translated by Sarkar, Mughal Adm., 198-214), Manucci iii 253.

The final annexation of Bijapur and Golkonda was actuated by political rather than financial considerations. The growing power of the Marāthās posed a problem that could no longer be ignored. The results seem to have borne out all the fears which had made Aurangzīb hold back from undertaking a forward policy in the Deccan during the first two decades of his reign. The military operations proved long and expensive, and gold had freely to be expended to buy over Deccani nobles. For purposes of political expediency, large numbers of Deccani nobles had to be given manṣabs and employment. In the best of times it would have been difficult to satisfy the aspirations of all the new entrants. Unsettled conditions in the Deccan and North India and Marāthā depredations made the task doubly difficult. As it was, the Deccani nobles were dissatisfied at the 'low' ranks accorded to them.<sup>1</sup> Almost every noble desired a jāgīr in Northern India or in the settled parts of the country, and exerted his influence to that end. This placed the officials of the revenue department in an extremely difficult situation. As 'Ināyatullah Khān, the Dīwān-i-Tan-o-Khālisa and a great personal favourite with Aurangzīb, complained. "The contingents of the officers who are daily passed in review before your Majesty are unlimited (in number) while the land available for granting as jāgīrs is limited (in area). How can a limited figure be made equal to an unlimited one?"<sup>2</sup>

The result was that there were inordinate delays in the grant of jāgīrs, and when finally granted they yielded only a fraction of the sanctioned emoluments.<sup>3</sup> The efforts of the jāgīrdārs to realise the full

1 Aurangzeb V 68.

2 Aḥkām 57. We are told that the number of manṣabdārs had increased from 8000 in 1659 to 14,556 in 1690 (Wāris, Bādshāhnāmāh, 70; Zawābit-i-Ālamgīrī (Or. 1641) f. 15a; Sharma, Religious Policy, 133). Out of these, 7,657 nobles were on cash (naqdī) salaries, while only 6,899 held jāgīrs, i.e. less than half of the total.

3 Thus, see K.K. 602-3. See Raḡḡ'im ff. 6b-7a for Aurangzīb's efforts to check inflation of revenue artificially in Gujarāt.

value of their jāgīrs seem to have made themselves felt in a number of areas, especially in the marginal areas such as those around Agra, or on the borders of Rajputana and parts of the Deccan where agriculture had never yielded a very large surplus. The flight of peasants from land<sup>1</sup> was the first symptom of this growing crisis which later on spilled into violence and desperate armed uprisings.

The uncertainty of income from the jāgīrs also demoralized the administration. Many nobles practically ceased maintaining contingents or kept a far smaller contingent than was required. Many others in the Deccan came to a private arrangement with the Marāthās for the division of the state dues, instead of resisting their encroachments. Others—especially those in the lower grades, began to prefer cash salaries to jāgīrs, or to farm out their jāgīrs to various middle-men.<sup>2</sup>

Thus, by the end of Aurangzīb's reign, the jāgīrdārī system had reached the stage of an acute crisis, presaging a complete breakdown, or a new series of reforms which would remove the worst abuses and to give official sanction to things which could not be changed. It is necessary to bear in mind, however, that the problem of the jāgīrdārī system was, at root, a social problem which no mere economies in expenditures and administrative devices for expanding cultivation could solve. What was really required was the rapid expansion of industry and trade, based on the introduction of new technology and the removal of all barriers hindering that expansion. These barriers, in the ultimate resort, were the barriers of the existing social order which encompassed trade and industry in too narrow a sphere. Hence, a basic improvement in the situation was beyond the competence of any one king.

* * *

From the foregoing review, it should be apparent that at the end of Aurangzīb's reign, the Mughal empire was faced with a serious

See Akhbārāt 11 Rajab yr. 39|Feb. 5, 1696 for the imprisonment of a noble who refused to serve without a jāgīr.

<sup>1</sup> See Bernier 225-26. Raḡā'im 24a-b

<sup>2</sup> Thus, see Akhbārāt 24 Jam. II, Yr. 38 Jan. 29, 1695 for leasing out of jāgīrs to merchants by nobles in Kashmīr. Cf. also the remarks of Khāfī Khān (ii 88-9, 565) about the state of the administration under Aurangzīb.

situation. The financial position had grown steadily worse and, as a result of this and a number of other developments, the crisis of the jāgīrdārī system had reached a stage when the entire manṣabdārī system was threatened with collapse. The spirit of obscurantism and revivalism had grown both among the Muslims and Hindus: the efforts to create a composite ruling class had suffered a set back and separatist forces had been strengthened. The rebellions of the Jats, Sikhs, etc., the breach with the Rathors, and the prolonged conflict with the Marāthās had damaged imperial prestige, and encouraged the forces of opposition in all quarters. Ambitious men were attempting to gather strength in their hands in order to strike out on their own should the situation warrant it. Thus, the general atmosphere was one of expectancy and uncertainty.

However, in spite of many defects of policy and a number of personal shortcomings on Aurangzīb's part, the Mughal empire was still a powerful and vigorous military and administrative machinery. The Mughal army might fail against the elusive and highly mobile bands of Marāthās in the mountainous regions of the Deccan. Marāthā forts might be difficult to capture and still more difficult to retain. But in the plains of Northern India and the vast plateau extending upto the Karnatak, the Mughal artillery was still master of the field. Thirty or forty years after Aurangzīb's death, when the Mughal artillery had declined considerably in strength and efficiency, the Marāthās could still not face it in the field of battle.<sup>1</sup> Continuous anarchy, war and the depredations of the Marāthās may have depleted the population of the Deccan and brought its trade, industry and agriculture to a virtual stand-still. But in Northern India which was the heart of the empire and was of decisive economic and political importance in the country, the Mughal administration still retained much of its vigour. In fact, the administration at the district level proved amazingly tenacious and a good deal of it survived and found its way indirectly into the British administration.

Politically, despite the military reverses and the mistakes of 1 Cf. Bernier who has a rather low opinion of the morale, discipline and organisation of the Mughal armies, (p. 55) but considers the "stirrup-artillery" to be "extremely well-appointed", (217-18).

Aurangzīb, the Mughal dynasty still retained a powerful hold on the mind and imagination of the people.<sup>1</sup>

It is against this entire background that the history of India in the eighteenth century and the parties and politics at the Mughal court have to be viewed.

Note on khālīṣah and zamindars

In the case of the states of many autonomous or semi-autonomous zamindars and rajas, the Mughal government neither interfered with local administration nor did it fix the revenue demand on the basis of a detailed assessment. It fixed a lump-sum tribute called peshkash which was generally to be deposited in the khālīṣah treasury (though it appears that sometime this tribute could also be assigned to a manṣabdār as part of his tankhwah-i-jāgīr.<sup>2</sup> Or, it might be assigned to the raja himself as watan jāgīr).

However, the phrase "dar khālīṣah zabt namūdan" (taking a state into khālīṣah) is used either in the sense of depriving a raja of his watan jāgīr or dispossessing him of his zamindari. The use of the word annexation in the context of removing a raja from his hereditary domains is, therefore, misleading.

In the case of Aurangzīb's action in Marwar on the death of Jaswant Singh, the words "bringing the state under khālīṣah" have been used in the specific sense of taking over the administration and the revenue-collection from the members of the ruling branch of the house. After some time, the state was handed over to Inder Singh, the grandson of Amar Singh who was the elder brother of Jaswant Singh. It seems that in many cases of disputed succession where the Emperor for any reason could not or did not decide whom to recognise as the raja, or on account of dissatisfaction with the conduct of a raja wanted to remove him, he appointed imperial officers to administer that territory and collect revenue till such time as he had decided whom to recognise as the raja. Thus, taking over the state of a raja under khālīṣah was somewhat similar to the administration of states under Court of Wards. (For further examples, see p. 31 below).

1 Cf. Spears, Twilight of the Moghuls, (p. 9): "there was for his (the Emperor's) authority something of the reverence and spirit of acceptance which exists in Britain for the parliament."

2 For example, the territory of the raja of Nagarkot was assigned in jāgīr to Birbal to whom the raja was required to pay a substantial amount. (Akbarnāma iii 36-37).

CHAPTER I

BEGINNING OF THE PARTY STRUGGLE AT THE COURT

i. Groups at the Court.

Towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign, and by the beginning of the eighteenth century, two groups of nobles came to the forefront at the court. These groups played an important part at the Mughal Court for the next four decades. Hence, the character and composition of these groups, and the antecedents, outlook and political affiliations of the leading characters in the two groups deserve careful examination.

The leading figures in the first group were the Wazīr-ul-Mamālik Asad Khān, and his son Zū'lfiqār Khān who had become Bakhshī-ul-Mamālik in 1702. Asad Khān belonged to a well-known family of Īrān, his grandfather Zū'lfiqār Khān being the Bēglar Bēgī of Shīrwān in the time of Shāh 'Abbās I. After the execution of Zū'lfiqār Khān by Shāh 'Abbās on some suspicion in 1600-01, the family had to face hard times, and Asad Khān's father Khānlar (entitled Zū'lfiqār Khān Qarāmānlū), migrated to India towards the end of Jahāngīr's reign. He was shown great kindness by Shāh Jahān, married to the daughter of Ṣādiq Khān, the brother-in-law of Yamīn-ud-Daulah Āṣaf Khān, and raised ultimately to the rank of 3000. Towards the end of Shāh Jahān's reign, he retired on account of paralysis, and settled down at Patna.<sup>1</sup>

Muḥammad Ibrāhīm, entitled Asad Khān, was the eldest son of Zū'lfiqār Khān Qarāmānlū by Ṣādiq Khān's daughter, and was apparently born in 1055 H/1625-26. He was a great favourite with Shāh Jahān and married the daughter of Āṣaf Khān. In 1654, he received the title of Asad Khān, and was made Ākhtah Bēgī (Master of the Horses), and soon afterwards, the second Bakhshī. It is not necessary for our purposes to examine the subsequent career of Asad Khān in detail. Suffice it to say that he was a great favourite with Aurangzīb also, and continued to serve under him as the second Bakhshī. In 1661, he was raised to the rank of 4000/2000. In 1669, when the wazīr, Ja'far Khān, died, no one was appointed to succeed him, Asad Khān being nominated the nā'ib wazīr. The following year, he was also nominated as the Chief Bakhshī in succession to Lashkar Khān deceased, and combined this post with that of the nā'ib wazīr till 1673. In 1676, he was promoted to the post of the wazīr, and formally invested with the jewelled ink-pot of office.<sup>2</sup> Subsequently, he was appointed to the Deccan at the head of a large army, and later served in the Rājput campaign. He took an active part in the siege of Bijāpur, and was rewarded with the masnad of wizārat.<sup>3</sup> Next year, following the capture of Golkonda, he was raised to the rank of 7000/7000.

<sup>1</sup> Tūrīkh-i-'Ālam Arṭā'i 'Abbarī by Iskandar Munshi 570, M.U. ii 85-89.

Thus, by 1676, Asad Khān had attained a pre-eminent position which he continued to hold during the remaining thirty-one years of Aurangzīb's reign — one of the longest spells of office enjoyed by any wazīr. His rank and position, noble lineage and relationship with the royal family ensured him the highest respect from all quarters. Aurangzīb, we are told, had a very high regard for his capacities and capabilities, though it is difficult to estimate the influence he exercised as wazīr in shaping Aurangzīb's policies.<sup>4</sup> Towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign, Asad Khān was, for some time, placed in charge of the base camp at Islāmpurī, being considered too old and infirm for active campaigning. Later, he accompanied Aurangzīb during the sieges of Kondānā, Rājgarh and Wākinkherā.

Zu'lfiqār Khān, the son of Asad Khān, was born in 1649, and received his first manṣab in 1660 when he was only eleven years old. In 1677, he was married to the daughter of Amīr-ul-Umarā Shā'istah Khān, who was the maternal uncle of Emperor Aurangzīb, and awarded the title of I'tiqād Khān. As I'tiqād Khān, he made his mark in 1689 by the capture of Rāhērī (Rājgarh)—an extremely strong fort in which the treasures and families of Shambhājī and Rājāram were lodged. As a reward, he was raised to the rank of 3000/2000, and granted his ancestral title of Z̤u'lfiqār Khān. After this, he was sent against the fort of Panhālā.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> M.A. 152, M.U. ii 311.

<sup>3</sup> M.A. 281, M.U. ii 311-312. This implied that Asad Khān was permitted to sit on a masnad in the royal presence which was deemed a very high honour. The date for this event was found in the chronogram—"Zēbā shudāh masnad-i-wizārat" (1097). Beveridge (M.U. i 270) has wrongly taken this to mean that he was appointed wazīr at the time.

<sup>4</sup> For Aurangzīb's recommendation of Asad Khān to his sons, see Aḥkām 11.

The real career of Z̤u'lfiqār Khān may, however, be said to commence with his nomination in 1690 to the command of an army for the capture of Jinjī. It was an important assignment, for Rājārām, the successor of Shambhājī, had taken shelter there and made it the rallying centre of the Marāthās. With Jinjī in his hands and Rājārām captured, Aurangzib hoped to bring the Marāthā campaign to a virtual end, the task of establishing law and order in the rest of Mahārāshtra not being considered so difficult a task thereafter. But Z̤u'lfiqār Khān found himself faced with tremendous difficulties. Jinjī was an extremely strong fortress, and his forces were really not adequate for the task assigned to him. Communications and supplies were difficult to maintain in the face of Marāthā activities, the lack of support by the local population and chiefs,<sup>6</sup> and the fact that many of the Deccani nobles assigned to Z̤u'lfiqār Khān were disaffected and did not have their heart in the enterprise.<sup>7</sup> With the arrival of Santājī Ghorpāde and Dhānājī Jādav in the Karnātak in 1692, the situation became all the more difficult. Z̤u'lfiqār Khān found himself hard-pressed, and Asad Khān and Prince Kām Bakhsh were ordered to go to his help. However, the latter's intrigues caused further confusion, and necessitated his arrest, and a temporary abandonment of the siege.<sup>8</sup> It was not till 1698 that Z̤u'lfiqār Khān captured Jinjī, and even then the chief prize, Rājārām, escaped him. Aurangzib was far from pleased at this, but rewarded Z̤u'lfiqār Khān with a rise of 1000 sawārs, bringing his manṣab to 5000/5000.<sup>9</sup>

The Jinjī period marks an important phase in the life of Z̤u'lfiqār Khān, for it was apparently during this period that he gathered a group

<sup>5</sup> M.A. 332-3, M.U. ii 94.

<sup>6</sup> Sarkar, Aurangzeb v 94-96.

<sup>7</sup> Sarkar, Aurangzeb v 68, 74.

<sup>8</sup> For details, see Aurangzeb v 78-85.

<sup>9</sup> M.A. 392, M.U. ii 97. Irvine ii. 9 is not correct in stating that the title of Nusrat Jang was conferred on him at the same time. He was accorded this title in the 39th regnal year (1696-7) when he was also raised to the manṣab of 5000/4000. Earlier, in Jan. 1692, he had been made 4000/2500 for the capture of Trinomālee (M.A. 345).

of devoted followers, and formed many associations with the Deccani nobles. According to some contemporary observers, he even began to nurse the ambition of independence in the Deccan.<sup>10</sup> The political views of Zu'lfīqār Khān also began to develop during this period. In 1697, he forwarded to Aurangzīb a proposal from Rājārām for a settlement, but Aurangzīb would not hear of it.<sup>11</sup>

After the fall of Jinjī, Zu'lfīqār Khān was, at first, deputed to deal with the Marāthā general, Dhānājī Jādhav, in the Konkan, and then given a roving commission to deal with the Marāthā bands wherever they might be. Zu'lfīqār Khān failed to inflict much damage on Dhānājī due to the rapid movements of the latter, but he won frequent successes against the other Marāthā chiefs, and earned a name for himself as one of the most successful generals. In 1702, he succeeded Bahramand Khān deceased as the Mīr Bakshī. In 1705, when Aurangzīb was hard pressed at Wāinkherā, Zu'lfīqār Khān was summoned with all his generals. His arrival turned the tide of battle and the fort fell soon afterwards. But as Aurangzīb suspected Zu'lfīqār Khān and his lieutenant, Dalpat Rao, of colluding in the escape of Pidiā Nāyak, he was given insignificant rewards.<sup>12</sup> However, he was raised soon afterwards to the rank of 6000/6000.<sup>13</sup>

A significant step taken by Aurangzīb in 1706 was the transfer of 10 François Martin, the founder of Pondicherry, who was in constant touch with the court of Jinjī, "frequently in his letters and Memoirs expressed the opinion that Zu'lfīqār Khān had, during the course and particularly at the end of the siege of Jinji, an understanding with Rajaram; in expectation of the death of the very old Aurangzeb and the civil wars that would fatally follow among his sons, he had conceived the ambition of caving out for himself an independent principality, and with that object he wanted to placate (manage) the Marathas." (Kaepelin 295 n, quoted in Aurangzeb v 101).

Manucci (iii 271) says the same thing, and Bhimsen, who was in Zu'lfīqār's camp, also hints at it (Dil. 125a, 106a).

11 Dil. 122b, Aurangzeb v 105.

12 Dil. ii 153b. M.U. (ii 98-99) ascribes it, however to the envy aroused in Aurangzīb's breast by the universal praise of Zu'lfīqār Khān. "As Emperor Aurangzīb was disposed to be malicious and uncharitable, he to spite Zu'lfīqār Khān granted increased allowances to the Tūrānī officials, and to him he only granted a sword and robe of honour, and deputed him to capture certain forts and to chastise the Marāthās".

13 B.N. 103, M.U. ii 99.

Shāhū to Zū'lfīqār Khān's army for the purpose of negotiating a settlement with the Marāthās. This was a tacit recognition of the political importance attained by Zū'lfīqār Khān, as also his special relations with the Marāthās. From this time, if not earlier, Zū'lfīqār Khān seems to have taken a close personal interest in Shāhū. He wrote conciliatory letters to the Marāthās, inviting them to join Shāhū, but the Marāthā sardars were too suspicious of Mughal policy for any positive response on their part.<sup>14</sup>

Thus, by the time Aurangzīb died, Asad Khān and Zū'lfīqār Khān occupied the two leading posts at the court—those of wazīr and Mīr Bakhshī with the ranks of 7000 and 6000 respectively, and had acquired tremendous prestige and influence. Zū'lfīqār Khān was one of the most successful generals of the time and was considered a rising star. Among the chief supporters of Zū'lfīqār Khān may be mentioned Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, Rao Dalpat Bundela, and Rao Rām Singh Hārā. All the three were renowned warriors, and had served in the Karnātak for a long time under Zū'lfīqār Khān. Rao Rām Singh, the Hārā chief, had succeeded to the gaddi of Kotah in 1692-93 at the instance of Zū'lfīqār Khān and had served under him since then. In 1706 Zū'lfīqār Khān had also secured for him the zamindari of Bundi in place of Budh Singh who had been displaced.<sup>15</sup> Rao Dalpat Bundela, who had entered service in 1668, was assigned to Jinjī in 1690 and served with Zū'lfīqār Khān thereafter.<sup>16</sup>

Dā'ūd Khān Pannī was the son of Khiz̤r Khān, a merchant who had risen to the position of one of the leading sardars of Bījāpur. After the assassination of Khiz̤r Khān at the hands of the Deccani party in 1677, Dā'ūd Khān had entered the Imperial service along with his brother, Sulaimān Khān, and was attached to his uncle, Ranmast Khān, who later acquired great fame and was awarded the title of Bahādur Khān. Later, he was attached to Zū'lfīqār Khān, and made his mark by his exploits during the siege of Jinjī. When Zū'lfīqār Khān was recalled to the court after the capture of Jinjī, Dā'ūd Khān was made his deputy in the faujdārī of Haiderābādī-Karnātak and two years later, in 1701, the faujdārī of Bījāpurī-Karnātak was added to it. In 1704, he was made the deputy for Prince Kām Bakhsh who was the ṣūbahdār of Haiderābād, and raised to the rank of 6000/6000.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Dil. ii 154b-155a, M.A. 511, Aurangzeb v 207.

<sup>15</sup> M.A. 514, M.U. ii 323.

<sup>16</sup> M.U. ii 317-323.

Dā'ūd Kkān had many connections among the Deccani nobles, and was reputed to be a very wealthy man. It was said, too, that he held, rather unorthodox opinions, and that he was very favourably inclined towards the Hindus.<sup>18</sup>

It should be obvious from the foregoing account that the group consisting of Asad Khān, Zū'lfiqār Khān and his adherants was a very powerful and influential group. The combined manṣabs of its leading-figures came to 24,500 zāt and 24,000 sawār.<sup>19</sup> It is also obvious that the group was not a racial one. Asad Khān and Zū'lfiqār Khān, although proud of their Persian descent, had been born in India, and by the time Aurangzīb died had been in the country for more than three-quarters of a century. The group was essentially a family cum personal group, and was held together by family loyalties and the personal relations of its adherants with Zū'lfiqār Khān. The group had no clearly defined politics at the time, but we have already noted Zū'lfiqār Khān's interest in Shāhū and his efforts to secure a settlement with the Marāthās. His close association with the Bundela and the Hārā Rājput chiefs was also not without significance.

The second group at the court consisted of Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang, his sons Chīn Qulīch Khān (later Nizām-ul-Mulk) and Hāmid Khān Bahādur, and his cousin, Muḥammad Amīn Khān.<sup>20</sup> Fīrūz 17 M.A. 439, 483; M.U. ii 63-65. He was removed from the nā'ib Governorship of Haiderābād in 1705 and sent to assist Zū'lfiqār Khān in the siege of Wākinkherā (M.A. 494).

18 He had a Hindu wife, and was said to keep in his house an idol which he worshipped (see K.K. 884, 964; Mir'āt i 403).

19 This was made up as follows:—

				Zāt	Sawār
Asad Khān	..	..	..	7,000	7,000
Zū'lfiqār Khān	..	..	..	6,000	6,000
Dā'ūd Khān	..	..	..	6,000	6,000
Dalpat Bundela	..	..	..	3,000	3,000
Rām Singh	..	..	..	2,500	2,000
				24,500	24,000

20 References to the careers of these nobles are as follows: Fīrūz Jang M.U. ii 872; Nizām-ul-Mulk iii 837, 875; M. Amīn Khān i 346; Hāmid K. iii 765.

Jang's father, Khwājah 'Ābid, had come to India towards the end of Shāh Jahān's reign and joined Aurangzīb in the Deccan just as he was starting for northern India to contest the throne. The father of Khwājah 'Ābid, 'Alam Shaikh, was a well known man of letters in Bukhārā and traced his descent from the famous saint Shaikh Shihāb-ud-Dīn Suhrawardī. Khwājah 'Ābid took part in the expeditions against Dārā, Shuja', and Jaswant Singh, and was rewarded with the post of Ṣadr-i-Kul. Later, he was appointed the Governor of Ajmer and then of Multan. In the 16th year of the reign (1674-75), he came under a shadow and was sent on pilgrimage to Mecca. He was restored to the post of Ṣadr-i-Kul in 1680-81, and was subsequently made the Governor of Bidar. He died of a gun-shot wound at the siege of Golkonda in 1687. His manṣab at the time was 5000.<sup>21</sup>

Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān (Mīr Shihāb-ud-Dīn) came to India in 1079-80 H./1668-69, and made his mark in the Rājput War when at great personal risk he brought the Emperor news of Ḥasan 'Alī Khān's column in the Arāvalī ranges. He served against the Marāthās with distinction, and was awarded the titles of Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān and Fīrūz Jang. In 1685, he received the fish standard (māhī marātīb) for bringing provision to A'zam at the siege of Bijāpur. He was given the main credit for its capture and raised to the rank of 7000/7000. Next year, he added fresh laurels to his crown by the capture of Adonī. The same year he was blinded in an epidemic of bubonic plague at Ḥaiderābād<sup>22</sup> but continued in the service. In 1698, he was appointed the Governor of Berar, a post which he continued to hold during the rest of Aurangzīb's reign. From 1700 to 1702, he was also in charge of the base camp at Islāmpurī, and was commissioned to chase Nīmājī in Malwa and Berar. He inflicted a crushing defeat on Nīmājī and was rewarded with the title of Sipah Sālār. He kept a large park of artillery as may be gauged from a typical incident. In 1701, on his way back from Bahādurpur, Aurangzīb passed near the camp of Ghāzī-ud-Dīn, and, as was his custom, held a review of the Khan's troops. The Khan's army covered four measured kos and included a splendid park of artillery. After inspecting them, Aurangzīb confiscated a good part of the artillery, and wrote a letter of reproof to Prince Bīdār Bakht, saying "You with double allowances have no such establishment of guns as Fīrūz Jang has. He has all the things that he should have, or rather, that he should not have".<sup>23</sup>

<sup>21</sup> M.U. iii 837, 875.

<sup>22</sup> The plague raged for two months and carried off about a lakh of people. It chiefly affected the eyes, ears and speech (M.A. 317-19).

Chīn Qulīch Khān was born in 1082 H./1671, presumably at Agra. He participated in the early campaigns of his father, including that of Adonī, and was then commissioned to chastise the Marāthās. In 1699, he was raised to the manṣab of 3500/3000, and the following year, he was made the Governor of Bijāpur and the faujdār of Til-Konkan, A'zamnagar and Belgaum and raised to 4000/4000. He took an active part in the capture of Wākinkherā in 1705, and was rewarded with the rank of 5000/5000. We are told that after the capture of Wākinkherā, Chīn Qulīch acquired great influence with the Emperor who, it is said, consulted him on all important matters of state.<sup>24</sup> Chīn Qulīch's half-brother, Ḥāmid Khān Bahādur, and brother, Raḥim-ud-Dīn Khān, also served under Fīrūz Jang. In 1707, they held the manṣabs of 2500/1500 and 1500/600 respectively.<sup>25</sup>

Chīn Qulīch's second cousin, M. Amīn Khān, came to India in 1687, after the execution of his father by the Khan of Bukhārā. He was appointed to the manṣab of 2000/1000 and, in course of time, acquired a reputation as a brave and intrepid warrior. At first, he served under Fīrūz Jang. In 1698, he was called to the court and made the Ṣadr. It is said that Aurangzīb took this step with the deliberate intention of counter-balancing the Īrānīs, since he had grown suspicious of the power of the leading (Īrānī) family, that of Asad Khān and Zu'lfīqār Khān.<sup>26</sup> This appears doubtful however, Aurangzīb had, at first, chosen Khwājah 'Abdullāh to succeed as the Ṣadr, but the Khwājah died at Aḥmadnagar before he could set out for the court. Aurangzīb then appointed M. Amīn Khān as the Ṣadr. He was considered well-qualified for the post on account of his descent from Shaikh Shihāb-ud-Dīn Suhrawardī, and because his uncle, Khwājah 'Ābid, had held the post of Ṣadr during the early years of Aurangzīb's reign. As a matter of fact, little evidence can be found to support the popular belief that Aurangzīb discriminated against nobles of Persian extraction on the ground of their Shī'ite faith, although 23 M.A. 468, M.U. ii 875-6.

24 M.A. 474, 481, 496, 515, Y. H. Khān, Aṣaf Jāh, 42.

25 M.A. 481, M.U. iii 766.

26 M.U. i 347.

it is true that he made no secret of his personal dislike correct position of the Shī'ite doctrines. Thus, many of his leading officials were of Īrānī extraction and, presumably, followed the Shī'ite faith. Soon after his appointment as the Sadr, M. Amīn Khān submitted a petition making a request for the post of one of the Bakhshīs, on the ground that "both the Bakhshīships have been conferred on heretical demon-eating Shī'ahs". and that his appointment would be the "means of strengthening the (Sunni) faith and snatching away employment from accursed mis-believers". Aurangzīb sternly rejected the petition.<sup>27</sup> The fact that Zū'lfiqār Khān was appointed the Mīr Bakhshī in 1702 also tends to disprove the suggestion that Aurangzīb entertained doubts regarding the loyalty of this family to the throne.

With numerous other influential connections, and highly respected on account of its noble and saintly lineage, this group of nobles which we may call the "Chīn" group occupied a position of great power and importance. The combined manṣabs of the leading adherents of the group came to 20,000 zāt, 15,600 sawār.<sup>28</sup> In actual power and influence it was, however, definitely inferior to the group of Asad Khān, Zū'lfiqār Khān etc. In character, it was essentially a racial cum family group. Both Fīrūz Jang and M. Amīn Khān had themselves come to India from Tūrān. They were always ready to extend patronage to their compatriots from Tūrān so that Tūrānians formed a large part of their following.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>27</sup> Aḥkām 39.

Aurangzīb wrote across the petition, "What connection have earthly affairs with religion? and what right have administrative works to meddle with bigotry? For you is your religion for me is mine. If this rule (suggested by you) were established it would be my duty to extirpate all (Hindu) Rajas and their followers".

<sup>28</sup> This was made up as follows:

				Zāt	Sawār
Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang	..	..	..	7,000	7,000
Chīn Qulīch Khān	..	..	..	5,000	5,000
M. Amīn Khān	..	..	..	4,000	1,500
Hāmid Khān	..	..	..	2,500	1,500
Raḥīm-ud-Dīn Khān	..	..	..	1,500	600
				20,000	15,600

<sup>29</sup> M.U. iii 169.

Chīn Qulīch Khān and Hāmid Khān also were generous patrons of the Tūrānīs. This gave the group greater cohesiveness than the group of Asad Khān, Zū'lfiqār Khān, etc. But the strained relations between Fīrūz Jang and Chīn Qulīch Khān,<sup>30</sup> and the blindness of the former were a serious drawback for this group.

Between these two groups of nobles there was, from the beginning, a sense of rivalry and competition for royal favour. In particular, the two younger men, Zū'lfiqār Khān and Chīn Qulīch Khān, had a keen sense of personal rivalry and did not get on well with each other.<sup>31</sup> While such rivalry was by no means unusual and must not be exaggerated, the ambitions of these two remarkable personalities, and their efforts to clear their way to supreme power constituted a fixed point in Mughal court politics for more than a quarter of a century, and powerfully influenced other developments during this period.

ii The Civil War

A civil war among the princes usually provided the nobles an opportunity for securing concessions of various types from the rival contestants. It also constituted a period of difficult decisions for individual nobles: failure to back the winning candidate might result in a serious set-back to their careers. The sons of Aurangzīb—Mu'azzam, A'zam and Kām Bakhsh—had been exerting themselves since a long time to win adherents among the nobles in anticipation of the civil war that would inevitably follow the death of Aurangzīb. The elder brother, Mu'azzam, had been imprisoned by Aurangzīb in 1687, and after his release in 1695, had been sent away to Kabul as the Governor.<sup>32</sup> Kām Bakhsh was learned and judicious but he was 30 Irādat 52.

31 Hādīqat 55, M.A. 439.

32 For the early life of the Princes, see Sarkar, Aurangzeb's Reign 46-129.

The eldest son, Muḥammad Sultān, was born in 1639 of his Hindu wife, Nawāb Bāi. He was imprisoned in 1659 for deserting to Shuja', and died in prison in 1676.

The fourth son, Muḥammad Akbar, was born in 1657 of his principal wife, Dīl-rās Bānū Begum. He rebelled in 1681, and died in Persia in 1704.

Of the surviving sons, Muḥammad Mu'azzam was born of Nawāb Bāi fickle-minded. A'zam had succeeded in winning the support of the leading nobles at the court. In particular, he had won over Asad Khān and Zu'lfiqār Khān to his side.<sup>33</sup> At the court, A'zam Shāh and Kām Bakhsh frequently quarrelled among themselves, and A'zam, presuming upon the men and resources at his disposal, sought opportunities for a show-down with Kām Bakhsh. In order to save the life of Kām Bakhsh and to prevent an outbreak of war between the two brothers while he was still alive, in February 1707 Aurangzīb appointed Kām Bakhsh the ṣūbahdār of Bījāpur and gave him leave to depart. Kām Bakhsh was presented with all the trappings of royalty, and permitted to beat his drums from the door of the royal enclosure—a privilege reserved for kings. Earlier, Aḥsan Khān had been appointed his chief Bakhshī and asked to look after him. M. Amīn Khān was also instructed to join him. M. A'zam was ordered to march to his ṣūbah of Malwa, and he left very much chagrined.<sup>34</sup>

A will alleged to have been found under Aurangzīb's pillow after his death provided for the partition of the empire, assigning Bījāpur and Ḥaidarābād to Kām Bakhsh. It is possible that in sending Kām Bakhsh to take charge of Bījāpur, Aurangzīb was also motivated by the desire of giving effect to this scheme, hoping that with the support of some of the leading nobles, Kām Bakhsh, who was the favourite of his old age, would be able to defend himself against his rivals. But perhaps Aurangzīb was concerned more with holding the balance even between his sons so that none of them might accuse him of favouritism in the same way as he had accused his father of favouritism towards Dārā. But Aurangzīb's hope of attaching M. Amīn Khān to Kām Bakhsh could not be realised. For Kām Bakhsh in 1643, A'zam of Dilras Bānū Begum in 1653, and Kām Bakhsh of Udaipuri Maḥal in 1670.

33 K. K. 547. Zu'lfiqār Khān had been granted the māhī marātib (fish standard) at the request of A'zam "though it was a rule not to give it to a noble below the rank of 6000". He had also been made sipah sālār at A'zam's request (Ruq'āt vi, Irādāt 14, M.U. i 310).

34 M.A. 520, K.K. ii 547-8, Dū. 158. According to the Jaipur wakīl's report (J.R. 26 Zīqā'dah yr. 51|26 Feb. 1707), it seems that A'zam claimed the entire Deccan for himself (tamām Dakin az-mū-ast) and left for Malwa very much displeased.

had travelled only a couple of stages from Aḥmadnagar when news was received of Aurangzīb's death, and immediately M. Amīn turned back to join A'zam.

When Aurangzīb died at Aḥmadnagar on 3rd March, 1707, A'zam had barely gone two stages from the Imperial Camp. He hurried back and took possession of the royal effects. All the nobles who were present at the court, including the wazīr, Asad Khān, declared for him. Zū'lfīqār Khān, the Mīr Bakhshī, who was on a roving mission to chase the Marāthās, hurried back from the Tungbhadra Duab with Rām Singh Hārā, Dalpat Bundela and Tarbiyat Khān Mīr Ātish and joined A'zam near Aurangābād.<sup>35</sup>

With the support of the most powerful nobles in the Empire, and with the royal stores and park of artillery and the veterans of the Deccan wars at his disposal, A'zam was popularly regarded as being in a very favourable position for winning the civil war. But his advantages were more apparent than real. Many of the high grandees were unwilling to face the hazards of a civil war and were half-hearted in A'zam's cause, or openly declined to accompany him. Thus, the powerful "Chīn group" did not evince any desire to take part in the forthcoming struggle. After proclaiming himself the Emperor, A'zam, in order to conciliate this important group, had conferred the rank of 6,000/6,000 on M. Amīn Khān, and that of 7,000/7,000 and the title of Khān-i-Daurān on Chīn Qulīch Khān. The latter was also made the Governor of Burhānpur (Khandesh) in place of Najābat Khān, and directed to send a deputy to his charge, remaining at the court himself. But Chīn Qulīch proceeded only a stage or two beyond Aurangābād, and quitted the camp on the pretext that his presence was required in his province.<sup>36</sup>

Fīrūz Jang remained at Daulatābād and made no move to join A'zam. Zū'lfīqār Khān proposed to A'zam that he should march via Daulatābād in order to compel Fīrūz Jang to join him. But A'zam was unwilling to leave the direct road to Agra, and gave a haughty answer that his opponent was not a Dārā Shikoh, and his personal

35 Akhbārāt. Zū'lfīqār Khān joined on 29 Zilḥijjah|2 April, 1707.

36 Akhbārāt 10,25 Zilḥijjah|14 March, 29 March, 1707, K.K. 572, Dil. 158 b. 162 a. Kāmwar mentions the rank of 5,000.

troops (Wālā-Shāhīs) were sufficient to deal with him.<sup>37</sup> In reality, A'zam was greatly annoyed at the refusal of Fīrūz Jang and Chīn Qulīch Khān to march with him, but thought it discreet to dissimulate, and thinking that it was "safer to leave Fīrūz Jang behind as a friend than as a foe", conferred the title of Sipah Sālār upon him, and made him the Governor of Aurangābād and the Viceroy of the Deccan. He was awarded an elephant and other presents which were all entrusted to Chīn Qulīch Khān to be forwarded to him. Maṣṣūr Khān, Dārōghah-i-Tōpkhānah-i-Dakin, was asked to look after Aurangābād till Fīrūz Jang's arrival.<sup>38</sup>

M. Amīn Khān, too, did not proceed a stage or two beyond Burhānpur. He plundered the rear of the army when it was passing through the rocky defiles of Dā'ūd-nagar, and returned to Burhānpur. Many of the soldiers raised in the Deccan also deserted. M. Amīn then joined Chīn Qulīch Khān at Aurangābād where they took possession of several districts.<sup>39</sup>

Not only Fīrūz Jang and Chīn Qulīch Khān, but even Asad Khān and Zū'lfiqār Khān were not keen to leave the Deccan and to accompany A'zam Shāh, and tried their best to persuade the latter to leave them in the Deccan by pointing to the activities of the Marāthās.<sup>40</sup>

The half-heartedness of these and other nobles is ascribed by Irādat Khān to the insane pride of A'zam which made him despise the advice of others, his Shī'ite inclinations, and his parsimoniousness in giving increments and promotions.<sup>41</sup> But Irādat Khān's charges do not seem 37 M.U. iii 877.

38 Akhbārāt 4 Muḥarram|29 March, K.K. 572, Qāsim, Zafar-Nāmāh-i-Bahādur Shāh 10.

Y. H. Khān (Āṣaf Jāh 35) states that Fīrūz Jang was put in charge of Burhānpur, which is not correct.

39 K.K. 572. A'zam declined several offers to pursue him and contended himself with sending farmāns to Fīrūz Jang and Chīn Qulīch about the matter.

40 Dil. 162 a, A'zam-ul-Ḥarb 188-92, Akhbārāt 27 Muḥ.|30 April, Kāmwar.

41 Irādat 11-12, Kāmwar A'zam was suspected of Shī'ite tendencies ever since his illness in 1693 when he had come under the influence of an Imāmīte faqīr (Aurangzeb v 363). He had given up the prayers of Friday, and more than half his army was allegedly made up of Shī'ites.

to be well founded. As another contemporary author, Khāfī Khān, observes, "in fact, he (A'zam) had not the money to be liberal with."<sup>42</sup> The Deccan wars had been very costly. The Deccan was traditionally a deficit area, and because of Aurangzib's reluctance to spend the hoarded treasures of Shāh Jahān, the pay of the army was sometimes three years in arrears towards the end of his reign, and the mainstay of the Emperor had come to be the revenues of Bengal. The little money that A'zam found in the royal treasury went to meet the arrears of the salaries to the soldiers.<sup>43</sup>

The bitter words and the ill-temper which A'zam occasionally showed no doubt alienated many of his followers. For if any noble spoke to A'zam on the question of money and promotions, "he in his proud and haughty way, gave sharp answers that there was no real necessity in his army, but fear of the opposite party."<sup>44</sup> However, the reluctance of the leaders of the two main groups at the court to participate in the civil war, their keenness to be left behind in the Deccan, their many connections with Deccan nobles, and the desertion of large numbers of Deccani soldiers with them suggest that the interests of both groups of nobles were already centred in the Deccan. This was a dangerous portent for the future since the Deccanis continued to regard northern India as an alien country, and the rule of the Mughals as alien rule. Hence, in case of weakness in the central authority, a move for the creation of an independent state or states in the Deccan was bound to gather momentum.

Many of A'zam's difficulties would have been solved if he could have reached and occupied Agra first, since it contained a good part of the hoarded treasure of Shāh Jahān. But "there was not a single person who doubted that, comparing the distance of Peshawar with the difficulties in the way of A'zam Shāh, Shāh 'Ālam would arrive before him".<sup>45</sup> A'zam might have gained control of Agra if he had permitted his son, Bīdār Bakht, who was the Governor of Aḥmadābād, to march on Agra. But A'zam's mind had been poisoned against Bīdār Bakht by suggestions that Bīdār Bakht nursed the ambition of winning the throne for himself. A'zam therefore ordered the latter to wait in Malwa till his arrival from the Deccan. Bīdār Bakht waited for A'zam for a month and twenty days in Malwa. Meanwhile, the third son of Shāh 'Ālam, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, who had been recalled from Bihar by Aurangzīb just before his death, reached Agra. The commandant of the fort, Bāqī Khān, who was the father-in-law of Bīdār Bakht, refused to yield the fort till one of the contestants reached in person. Since the previous arrival of Shāh 'Ālam was a foregone conclusion, this practically secured Agra for him.

<sup>42</sup> K.K. 531, 583.

<sup>43</sup> Asad Khān reported to A'zam that the Treasury of the Stirrup (khazānah-i-rikāb) contained fifty-two lakhs in cash, and fifty-three lakhs in ashrafs of hundred muhars (i.e. gold), while about a crore was owing to the soldiers in salary. A'zam Shāh ordered this entire sum to be utilised to pay the soldiers "so that he may be able to face God, and free himself of obligation to His late Majesty (Aurangzib)" (Khush-hāl 8-9).

<sup>44</sup> K.K. 581, 583.

Muḥammad Mu'azzam, entitled Shāh 'Ālam, was the Governor of Kabul and Lahore at the time of Aurangzīb's death. Besides this, the Governorship of Multān was held by his eldest son, Jahāndār Shāh. Another son, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, was the Governor of Bengal and Bihar. With the resources of these provinces and the recruiting grounds of the Punjab and Afghanistan at his disposal, Shāh 'Ālam was in a strong position to contest the claim of A'zam, through the latter had nothing but contempt for him, and called him a "baqqāl" (shop-keeper) in derision. In tact, foresight and understanding also, Shāh 'Ālam was superior to A'zam. His exile from the court in far away Kabul had really been a blessing in disguise, for he had been able to win to his side a body of reliable supporters, and to drill his army by constant marches so that he acquired a horror of sleeping under the roof of a house—a habit which he retained even later in life. He had been lucky in securing, in 1703, the services of an obscure nobleman, Mun'im Khān, who was a very efficient man of business, and, as Shāh 'Ālam's agent, soon put his finances in order. At Shāh 'Ālam's recommendation, Mun'im Khān was made the dīwān of Kabul, and the nā'ib ṣūbahdār of Punjab, and raised to the rank of 1500/1000.<sup>46</sup>

<sup>45</sup> Ibid. Irvine i 19 has misconstrued this passage and asserted just the opposite.

<sup>46</sup> For the career of Mun'im Khān, see M.U. iii 675 and Ch. II below.

In anticipation of a civil war, Mun'im Khān had exerted himself to gather a war chest for Shāh 'Ālam, and also silently collected camels, oxen to drag the cannons, and boats for crossing the rivers between Peshawar and Lahore.<sup>47</sup>

Shāh 'Ālam received the news of Aurangzīb's death at Jamrūd near Peshawar, on 20th March 1707. In view of Mun'im Khān's preparations, he was able rapidly to march on Lahore and from there to Delhi. Twenty-eight lakhs from the Lahore treasury, and thirty lakhs from the Delhi treasury helped him to pay his soldiers. Even then, we are told that many soldiers remained discontented and in acute want,<sup>48</sup> till Agra was reached on June 12. Bāqī Khān, the commandant of the fort, submitted to Shāh 'Ālam, and presented to him the keys of the fort. Two crores were taken out by Shāh 'Ālam from the treasures of Shāh Jahān, and distributed among his followers.

When A'zam reached near Gwalior, he received the news of the occupation of Agra by his rival. Much agitated, he decided to leave the wazīr, Asad Khān, at Gwalior with the ladies and the unnecessary equipment and jewels and treasure, and to march on Agra at once.

The two contestants met at the plains of Jājū, near Sāmūgarh, on 18 June, 1707. The forces of A'zam were definitely inferior to those of Shāh 'Ālam. We are told that A'zam had started with a force of 35,000 horses actual (maujūdī) which had swelled to 50,000 horses besides infantry by the time he reached Gwalior.<sup>49</sup> Shāh 'Ālam's force is placed by some authorities at as high a figure as 1,50,000 horse, but it may have been less.<sup>50</sup> Apart from the advantages which numbers and an ample treasury conferred, Shāh 'Ālam had also been able to stiffen his forces with heavy guns taken from the fort of Agra. On the other hand, A'zam had to leave most of his heavy artillery behind in the Deccan and at Gwalior in order to advance more 47 Irādat, K.K. 573.

48 Harcharan 17.

49 K.K. 583. The muster before Jājū revealed a strength of 65,000 horse and 45,000 foot.

50 Valentyn 276, Dil. 164 a.

quickly.<sup>51</sup> His army had also suffered greatly from the rigours of the march and the hot season.

Thus, by any reckoning, victory was beyond the grasp of A'zam Shāh. The battle of Jājū was essentially in the nature of a gamble on his part. He hoped to take the enemy by surprise, and to strike a decisive blow before Shāh 'Ālam had time to consolidate his position. For this reason, perhaps, he did not formulate any plan of action. Instead, he went boldly forward "like a fierce lion dashes upon a flock of sheep".<sup>52</sup>

A'zam gained an initial advantage in a brush with what he mistakenly thought was the main body of Shāh 'Ālam's force but was, in reality, only the advance-guard. As soon as the main force of Shāh 'Ālam joined battle, A'zam's position deteriorated. Shāh 'Ālam's artillery played havoc in his army. Many prominent nobles, and Prince Bīdār Bakht and his brother, Wālā Jāh, were killed. Zū'lfiqār also received a slight wound. Perceiving that the day was lost and that there was no hope of victory, he went up to A'zam Shāh and advised him to flee in order to live and fight another day.<sup>53</sup> But A'zam, probably with the fate of Dārā in his mind, refused to do so, and resolved to sell his life dearly. He continued to fight with a small force of 300-400 horse-men around him. Zū'lfiqār, accompanied by Ḥamīd-ud-Dīn Khān, went off to Gwalior, and his example was followed by many others. The end came when A'zam was struck by an arrow. Rustam Dil cut off his head, and carried it to Shāh 'Ālam.

Zū'lfiqār Khān's refusal to stand by the side of his royal master till the end has been adversely commented upon by a number of contemporary observers, some of whom go so far as to make his flight the chief cause of A'zam defeat.<sup>54</sup> While this is certainly an exaggerated view, there can be little doubt that Zū'lfiqār Khān's conduct

<sup>51</sup> Dil. 162 a. In a typical fashion, A'zam had loftily declared that fighting with artillery was not manly and that he would fight with swords only.

<sup>52</sup> Irādat.

<sup>53</sup> K.K. 596.

<sup>54</sup> Thus, Dānishmand Khān and Bhīmsen take the view that "If Nuṣrat Jang, as required by his loyalty, had joined actively with the other leaders in the violated contemporary notions of loyalty, and earned for Zu'lfikār Khān the reputation of being "ambitious" and "unreliable".

The War of Succession served to weaken the Empire further. About ten thousand men, and many brave and tried nobles, some of whom had won great reputation and experience against the Marāthās were killed. Dalpat Bundela and Rām Singh Hārā, the lieutenants of Zu'lfikār Khān, also perished on the battle-field. The two contestants, especially Shāh 'Ālam made lavish gifts and promises to the soldiers and nobles in order to win their support, and thus further worsened the already precarious financial position of the Empire.<sup>55</sup>

iii Marāthā and Rājput Affairs

We shall now take note of two steps of considerable historical importance taken by A'zam Shāh before his defeat. First of all, at Durāhā near the Narmada, Shāhū was allowed to escape. It is a controversial point whether he simply ran away, or his escape was connived at.<sup>56</sup> Some modern authors go so far as to assert that A'zam actually signed a treaty with Shāhū granting him the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan in attack, and had even for a little while held his own in the battle, all the difficulties which fell on A'zam Shāh would never have happened". (B.N., Dil. ff. 165).

Irvine (i. 30) follows Bhīmsen and declares: "His (Zu'lfikār's) flight determined the defeat of the army".

But K.K., who is a most careful and balanced observer, gives a different account.

- 55 K.K. (576) says that of the 24 crores amassed by Shāh Jahān, 9 crores of rupees in cash besides vessels of gold and silver were found in the Agra fort, or, according to another account, 13 crores including ashrafis and rupees of 100 to 300 tolas weight specially made for presents, and the ashrafis of 12 māshahs and 13 māshahs of Akbar's reign.

Four crores were taken out of this by Shāh 'Ālam, 2 crores being distributed among the officers and men.

- 56 K.K. (581) says that Zu'lfikār persuaded A'zam Shāh to set Shāhū at liberty along with 50 others who were his friends and companions. K.K. is followed by M.U. (ii 351) and, among modern historians, by Duff (i 304); addition to the swarajya of Shivaji, and numerous other concessions.<sup>57</sup> Apart from the doubtful authenticity of the authority upon which this assertion is founded, there also seems little reason for these sweeping Irvine (ii 162), Sardesai (Riyasat i 2), Sinha (Rise of the Peshwas, xii), and Rajwade (Patren Yadi ii 9).

[continued]

An entry in the Bahādur Shāh Nāmāh (d. 17 Jamāda II|15 Sept. 1707) states that "Shāhū, who had run away out of the wickedness and villainy of his nature and had intentions of rebellion and disturbance, had been removed from his manṣab of 7,000 zāt, 7,000 sawārs. He expressed repentance and asked for mercy and was restored to his manṣab".

A wāqī'ah-nawīs's report in the Akhbārāt. (14 Oct. 1707) also states that Shāhū had simply "run away" (fanār-kardah).

Bhīmsen, who was in Zu'lfikār's camp, writes, however, that Shāhū escaped at A'zam's instance. (Dil. ii 162).

There is necessarily no conflict in the views of Bhīmsen and Khāfī Khān. Shāhū went with a fairly large retinue, (50-70 according to K.K.), and no attempt was made to pursue him. It is clear that both A'zam and Zu'lfikār connived at his escape.

- 57 Thus, Kincaid and Parasnis (ii 121-3) mention a treaty in which A'zam agreed to chauth and sardeshmukhi over the six ṣubāhs of the Deccan, and also that Shāhū should be made Governor of Gondwānā, Gujarāt, and Tanjore "during good behaviour".

This appears unlikely, Gondwānā and Tanjore never having been Mughal ṣubāhs.

A Maratha document entitled Shiv Chhatrapatichi Bakhar states:

"While camping at Burhanpur through the good offices of Aurangzeb's daughter who regarded Shahu as her son, he with his followers was set free and allowed to proceed to Deccan on the following understanding:—

"You should proceed to your kingdom. Take care of the same by putting down formentors of quarrels. You should remain loyal to the Emperor and should not harass the Emperor's territories. When we are satisfied that your behaviour towards us is satisfactory we shall on reaching Delhi and on our accession to the throne set free your wife and other females who are in our captivity and shall grant you your sardeshmukhi watan in the six subas of the Deccan, right to levy Chauthai in the said subas of which you are in enjoyment, Mahals in Balaghat forming part of Bijapur Kingdom, half of Daulatabad Mahals forming part of the patashaha territory bounded by Bhima and Ganga and farmans relating to these shall be given to you. All thanas, forts and fortifications included in this territory are given to you. For the present, a letter addressed to the Suba is given to you stating that your Kingdom should be given to you and you should be allowed to concession to a captive prince who had hardly any independent support among the Marāthā sardars. On the other hand, the fact that no pursuit was undertaken and no orders regarding Shāhū issued to Imperial offices in the Deccan militates against the theory that Shāhū simply ran away. As a matter of fact, Shāhū gave out that he came armed with an Imperial farmān, and ceremoniously visited the tomb of Aurangzīb near Aḥmadnagar, and was not molested by the royal officers.<sup>58</sup>

Hence, the conclusion seems inevitable that Shāhū's escape was simply connived at. There was both policy and calculation behind it. His release would keep the Marāthās divided during A'zam's absence, and in the event of his establishing himself as the Marāthā ruler held out the prospect of an agreement with the Marāthās through him. According to Khāfī Khān, this step was taken at the instance of Zū'lfīqār Khān "who was very intimate with Shāhū and had for long been interested in his affairs".<sup>59</sup>

Next, at the instance of Zū'lfīqār, the manṣabs of 7,000/7,000, and the titles of Mirza Raja and Maharaja were conferred on Jai Singh and Ajit Singh respectively. Both the Rajas were asked to serve A'zam with large armies, Jai Singh actually joining Prince Bīdār Bakht in Malwa. Negotiations were also opened with the two Rajas for the restoration of their homelands to them, and they were promised "other favours undreamt of by their forefathers".<sup>60</sup> guard the same. Whatever territory in Karnatak, Gondvan, Gujrat, Tanjore belongs to you should be taken by you in your possession. Whenever the Emperor is in danger you should render help to him with your army and whatever orders are issued to you should be obeyed by you".

(Quoted in Deccan History Cong. Proceedings, 247-48).

58 K.K. 583. Earlier, his followers had looted and set fire to the out-skirts of Aurangābād.

59 K.K. 581. According to Marāthā tradition, at the capture of Raigarh, Zū'lfīqār had given an undertaking to Shāhū's mother, Yeshubai, that he would look after and protect Shāhū (K. & P. loc. cit. ii 111-2).

But no contemporary authority makes any reference to this.

60 Akhbārāt, 20 May 1707, Wakīl's reports d. 30th April and 24 May (Sitamau Collection—Misc. Papers Vol. I 97-101, 109-14; Sarkar Collection, Vol. XI, 117-23).

These two steps, although taken largely due to the exigencies of the civil war, represent a considerable departure from the policy of Aurangzīb. Perhaps, in the eyes of A'zam and Zu'lfiqār, the stern policy of Aurangzīb had proved a failure. Their actions presaged a new policy of concessions designed to bridge the gulf between the Rājputs and Marāthās, and the Mughal Empire. A'zam did not live to carry this policy to its logical conclusion. The task devolved upon Shāh 'Ālam who was called upon to find a solution to the vexed problems which faced the Empire.

A'zam had made a secret treaty with the Rana of Udaipur to give him the rank of 7,000/7,000, excuse the supply of contingent, remit jizyah in Mewar if not in the whole of India, and cede many parganas, such as Phulya, Mandalgarh, Bidar, Ghyāṣpur, Purdah, Dongarpur etc. which had been granted in lieu of the manṣab of 5,000, and subsequently re-attached (V.V. 659-6). The pact shows A'zam's willingness to make far-reaching concessions to the Rājputs to secure their help in the civil war.

CHAPTER II

CONCILIATION OR COERCION ?

Bahādur Shāh.

After ascending the throne, Bahādur Shāh (Shāh 'Ālam) was compelled to reckon with the problems which Aurangzīb had bequeathed to his successors—the worsening financial situation, the grave defects in the working of the jāgīrdārī system and the consequent demoralisation in the nobility, the growth of ideological trends among the Hindus and the Muslims which tended to accentuate mutual differences and suspicions, the general problem of maintaining law and order especially in the Deccan where the Marāthās posed a serious challenge to the Mughals, the conflict with the Sikhs, the continued differences with the Rathors and the Sisodias, and the effect of all these upon the prestige of the monarchy and upon the nobility some of whose members saw in the difficulties of the monarchy an opportunity for self-aggrandizement.

In facing these problems, Bahādur Shāh inclined towards a policy of cautious compromise and conciliation, both on account of his character and general outlook, and the concrete situation with which he was faced.

Bahādur Shāh did not share the puritancial outlook of his father, Aurangzīb, though he was of a deeply religious bent of mind and, we are told, never missed a chance of visiting a saint and conversing with him. Like some of his other brothers, he professed a belief in Śūfī doctrines, and was even suspected of Shī'ite inclinations.<sup>1</sup> He was born of a Hindu mother and, in accordance with the Mughāl tradition, also took a Hindu spouse,<sup>2</sup> but it would be difficult to say whether this modified his political and religious out-look in any way. Contemporary historians do not lend support to the view that the political policies of Bahādur Shāh were influenced in any considerable degree by his religious views. But with his elevation to the throne, the association of the monarchy with religious orthodoxy came to an end.

<sup>1</sup> See K.K. 603, 661-81 for the assumption of the title 'Saiyid' by Bahādur Shāh, and the rioting over his attempt to add the word "waṣī" after the name of 'Alī in the Friday prayers.

<sup>2</sup> Bahādur Shāh was born of Nawāb Bāi d/o Raja Rājū of Rājaurī (Kashmir).
[continued]

The political views of Bahādur Shāh during the period of his princehood are rather obscure. He held the post of Viceroy of the Deccan several times, but his policy and general conduct of affairs were considered weak and unsatisfactory by the Emperor who, for this reason, did not permit him to hold independent charge of the Deccan for any length of time.<sup>3</sup> During the final operations against Bījāpur and Golkonda, he was accused of colluding and conspiring with Abu'l Hasan, the king of Golkonda, and was placed in confinement by the Emperor. According to Khāfī Khān who wrote about forty years after these events, the prince considered the invasion of Golkonda a breach of faith and desired that "war and peace should be dependent on his approval as heir-apparent and that so far as possible he should bind Abu'l Hasan to his interest". For these reasons he had wanted to use his influence with the Emperor to obtain a pardon for Abu'l Hasan.<sup>4</sup>

Bahādur Shāh was not released from confinement till 1695. He was sent to northern India as the Governor of Agra, and was then appointed to Multan. In 1698, he was appointed the Governor of Kabul and specially charged with keeping watch on the Indo-Persian frontier. He was also nominated the Governor of Punjab in 1700. Thus, during an important phase of Aurangzib's reign, Bahādur Shāh remained largely out of touch with imperial affairs.

In the case of the Rājput, it appears that as early as 1681, Bahādur Shāh had concluded a secret treaty with the Rana of Mewār promising to abolish the jizyah, and to grant other favours to the Rājput in return for military support whenever he should enter into

In 1061H|1661 he was married to the d/o Raja Rūp Singh (M.A. 37, K.K. ii 123).

<sup>3</sup> Bahādur Shāh was the Viceroy of the Deccan after the removal of Shā'istah Khān, from 1667-72, and from 1678-80. (M.A. 45, 57, 60-61 et passim.).

Throughout this period, the actual command of the field armies was entrusted to some prominent noble appointed directly by Aurangzib.

<sup>4</sup> K.K. 331-32.

a contest for the throne with his brothers. It seems that pacts of a similar nature had been concluded by A'zam and Prince Akbar with the other Rājput chiefs.<sup>5</sup> While in the immediate context these pacts demonstrate the importance attached by all the princes to Rājput support, the division among the Rājputs reduced the value of their friendship in the long run. The pacts ceased to have much force with the passage of time, and during the War of Succession, Bahādur Shāh received no help from any of the ruling chiefs of Rājputānā.

The circumstances mentioned above seem to be largely responsible for the fluidity of Bahādur Shāh's views on the Rājput and Marāthā problems. Hence, in the early stages, his policy was one of trial and error, and of cautiously groping his way towards compromise and settlement of the outstanding problems and disputes.

The first problem before Bahādur Shāh was to choose the leading office-bearers.

After his victory over A'zam, Bahādur Shāh had declared that he would not regard it as an offence for any one to have helped A'zam Shāh, observing that if his own sons had been in the Deccan, they too would have been forced by circumstances to join A'zam. Hence, all those who submitted immediately were promised employment and restoration of the manṣabs held by them under Aurangzīb.<sup>6</sup> Letters of reassurance were sent to Asad Khān, Zu'lfikār Khān and others at Gwalior, and they were invited to the court. Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān Fīrūz Jang, Chīn Qulīch Khān, Muḥammad Amīn Khān, and many others were summoned from the Deccan.<sup>7</sup>

The policy of not penalising the adherents of a defeated rival was in keeping with the traditions of the Mughals in India, as well as in the best interests of the Empire and Bahādur Shāh personally. It enabled Bahādur Shāh to secure the adhesion of most of the old 'Ālamgīrī nobles, and to isolate Kām Bakhsh who maintained a precarious hold on Bijāpur and Ḥaidarābād. In fact, the war of succession was now

5 V.V. 659-60.

6 Irādat Khān (78-80) gives the main credit for this policy to Mun'im Khān who represented to the Emperor that it was not possible to administer the realm without the help and co-operation of the old 'Ālamgīrī nobles.

7 K.K. 600, Kāmwar 14.

regarded as virtually over, the defeat of Kām Bakhsh being considered only a matter of time.

The reconciliation of the pretensions and aspirations of the old 'Ālamgīrī nobles with the claims of his own immediate supporters formed the first serious test of statesmanship for Bahādur Shāh. In the alleged will and testament of Aurangzīb which Bahādur Shāh apparently regarded as genuine and which he had offered to accept on the eve of the battle of Jājū, a strong recommendation had been made to the princes to retain Asad Khān as the wazīr, no matter which one of them succeeded to the throne. On the strength of this recommendation, and on the basis of his long service and experience, family connections, etc., Asad Khān claimed the wizārat for himself, and the post of the Mīr Bakhshī for his son, Zū'lfiqār Khān. His claims were supported by Prince Jahān Shāh, then his father's favourite, and allegedly even by some of the Begums.<sup>8</sup>

Bahādur Shāh had little difficulty in accepting the claim on behalf of Zū'lfiqār Khān whom he raised to the rank of 7000/7000, and confirmed in his previous post of Mīr Bakhshī. But he had already promised the wizārat to his trusted follower and confidant, Mun'im Khān, whose services in securing the throne for him have been already noted. At the same time, Bahādur Shāh did not want to alienate two such capable and influential nobles as Asad Khān and Zū'lfiqār Khān.

A way out of the difficulty was sought by appointing Mun'im Khān as the wazīr, and reviving for Asad Khān the post of Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq which had not been conferred on anyone since the days of Āṣaf Khān in the reign of Shāh Jahān. Asad Khān accepted this proposal formally. But privately he submitted a petition claiming for the Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq all the privileges which had been enjoyed by Āṣaf Khān. These comprised the attendance of all the chief officials including the wazīr at his audience, the submission to him of all letters relating to the appointments, dismissals and transfer of the ṣūbahdārs, faujdārs, dīwāns, etc. for his signature, and of all the office reports regarding the resumption or transfer of jāgīrs; the right to receive a copy of all the reports from the provinces sent by the ṣūbahdārs, dīwāns, news-reporters, etc., and to keep in his possession the Great Seal which was fixed on all farmāns. In addition to these, he claimed other personal distinctions: the grant of the rank of 9000/9000, the tōgh tuman, the Governorship of Lahore, the right to sit in the Dīwān-i-Ām, permission to beat his drums after those of the royal princes, etc. etc.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Shākir 63.

Bahādur Shāh was greatly vexed at these vaulting claims of Asad Khān. But out of a desire to conciliate him, he accepted all his demands, except the claim for a manṣab of 9000/9000 and the right to sit in the Dīwān-i-Ām. These two privileges of Āṣaf Khān, it was explained, were due to his relationship with the Emperor. Hence, Asad Khān was granted the rank of 8000/8000 and the title of Āṣaf-ud-Daulah. Mun'im Khān was made the wazīr with the rank of 7000/7000 dū-aspah sih-aspah, one crore dām in'ām, and the title of Khān-i-Khānān and the (absentee) governorship of Agra. Two of his sons, Mahābat Khān and Khān-i-Zamān, were granted the ranks of 5000 and 4000 respectively, Mahābat Khān being also appointed to the post of third Bakhshī. Most of the other incumbents were confirmed in their previous offices.<sup>10</sup>

But this did not solve the difficulty. The older nobles were not happy at the sudden elevation of an obscure noble like Mun'im Khān to the wizārat. In particular, Asad Khān and Zu'lfiqār Khān resented the loss of the wazīr's office. On the other hand, Mun'im Khān disliked the regulations which, at least formally, made him a subordinate of Asad Khān, so that "on the day that Āṣaf-ud-Daulah acted as the dīwān, it became incumbent on Khan-i-Khanan to wait upon him as the other ministers did, and to obtain his signature to documents". Since Mun'im Khān had no intention of sharing his powers with Asad Khān, "whenever any ministerial business of importance arose, he did not communicate it to Āṣaf-ud-Daulah".<sup>11</sup>

9 Kāmwar 14, Qāsim 17. The text of Asad Khān's petition to the Emperor and the latter's reply have been quoted in T. Muṣ. (157-62) and Shākir (66-68).

10 B.N. 104-117, K.K. 626-27, Kāmwar 14.

11 B.N. 169, K.K. 601.

At length, an excuse was found to put the Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq out of the way. It was decided that as Asad Khān was fond of a life of comfort and pleasure and had reached an advanced age, he should retire to Delhi and rest there in peace. In accordance with this decision, he was asked to escort Zīnat-un-Nisā Begum to Delhi, and placed in charge of the ṣūbahs of Lahore, Delhi and Ajmer. Zū'lfīqār Khān was made his father's deputy, but "with the exception that the seal of Āṣaf-ud-Daulah was placed upon revenue and civil parwānās and sanads after the seal of the wazīr, he had no part in the administration of the government".<sup>12</sup>

Shortly after this, Chīn Qulīch Khān and Muḥammad Amīn Khān arrived from the Deccan. Muḥammad Amīn Khān was granted the rank of 5000/3500 and, at first, confirmed in the post of Ṣadr, but soon afterwards he was replaced and appointed the faujdār of Moradabad and Sambhal. This was an important charge, for the faujdārī of Moradabad was equal in area to a province.<sup>13</sup> Chīn Qulīch Khān was promoted to the rank of 6000/6000, accorded the title of Khān-i-Daurān, and made the Governor of Awadh and the faujdār of Gorakhpur. We are told that he accepted the post "with reluctance",<sup>14</sup> his heart still being in the Deccan, and resigned six weeks later. However, at Mun'im Khān's instance, he withdrew his resignation, and was raised to the rank of 7000/7000.<sup>15</sup>

Fīrūz Jang had been responsible for the disgrace and imprisonment of Bahādur Shāh at the siege of Golkonda in 1687, and was afraid to come to the court. As a special gesture to him, and at Mun'im Khān's instance, he was appointed the Governor of Gujarāt, and given permission to proceed to his charge without waiting upon the Emperor.<sup>16</sup> The presence in the Deccan of a rival claimant to the throne in the person of Kām Bakhsh was, perhaps, largely

<sup>12</sup> K.K. 601-2, B.N. 169-70. Asad Khān left for Delhi on Sept. 1, 1707.

<sup>13</sup> Akhbārāt Aug. 17, Oct. 28, B.N. 215, Kāmwar.

<sup>14</sup> B.N. 219, 226, K.K. 689.

<sup>15</sup> B.N. 283, 287, 290, 316; M.M. 96 b; K.K. 679. Akhbārāt (entry dated 13 Zīqā'dah Feb. 5, 1708) simply say that he came to Delhi (from his charge), and was dismissed.

<sup>16</sup> Irādāt 53.

responsible for the adoption of such a conciliatory policy, for the countenance of Fīrūz Jang's refusal to attend the court was interpreted as a sign of weakness.<sup>17</sup>

In the following years, Fīrūz Jang, Chīn Qulīch Khān and Muḥammad Amīn Khān do not seem to have exercised much influence on state policy. Some authors have ascribed this to the alleged ill-will of Mun'im Khān and Bahādur Shāh towards them.<sup>18</sup> It seems, however, that the real cause of the dissatisfaction of this group was a feeling of having received less than their deserts, and a lack of enthusiasm for the policy of "concessions" to the Rājputs, Marāthās, etc., which had been adopted by Bahādur Shāh at the instance of Mun'im Khān and Zu'lfiqār Khān. For this reason, they felt themselves out of joint with the spirit and policy of the administration.<sup>19</sup>

The position of this group was further weakened by the death of Fīrūz Jang in 1710. At about the same time, Chīn Qulīch resigned his mansab and post, and settled down to a retired life in Delhi.<sup>20</sup>

Thus, the two dominant figures on the scene remained Mun'im Khān, the wazīr, and Zu'lfiqār Khān, the Mīr Bakhshī. The party struggle at the court of Bahādur Shāh revolved mainly around the struggle for power between these two personalities. The struggle was not only personal, but had political implications too. Zu'lfiqār Khān apparently favoured a policy of bold and far-reaching concession to the Rājputs and the Marāthās with the object of healing the breach which had opened up between these sections and the Empire. This was foreshadowed by his actions as the chief advisor of A'zam Shāh

<sup>17</sup> Thus K.K. (616) observes:

"Such was the feebleness of the new ministry and such was the contempt into which their administration had fallen that the new governor (Fīrūz Jang) set out (for Gujarāt) without leave and even without waiting on the Emperor".

<sup>18</sup> Thus, the author of the M.U. (iii 667) states that it was on the adverse report of Muḥammad Amīn that Mun'im Khān had been reduced in rank by 590 sawār during the siege of Khelna in 1702, and had lost the office of the Dūrōghah-i-Fīlkhānah, as also his jāgīr. c/f M.A. 462 which gives a somewhat different account.

<sup>19</sup> Safinah-i-Khushgū, (O.P.L.) f. 158 b.

<sup>20</sup> Akhbārāt 8 Zīqā'dah Yr. 4 | Feb. 6. 1711, M.M. 99 b, K.K. 879.

during the latter's march from the Deccan to contest the throne. Mun'im Khān was very close to Bahādur Shāh in character and general outlook. Like Bahādur Shāh, he had been deeply influenced by Sūfī ideas: he was even credited with having written a book on Sūfī-ism which earned the disapproval of orthodox circles.<sup>21</sup> Too, like Bahādur Shāh, he was inclined towards a policy of compromise and conciliation. He had been partly instrumental in the adoption of a policy of generosity towards the old 'Ālamgīrī nobles who had espoused the cause of A'zam. However, being a noble who had newly risen to high position he lacked experience of political and administrative affairs, so that he was reluctant to make big departures from existing policies, or to undertake bold measures such as the situation required. His middle of the road policy satisfied no one, and ultimately created conditions in which the various problems of the empire worsened, and the struggle of parties and individuals at the court was sharpened.

ii The Rājput Question.

The problem which next engaged the attention of Bahādur Shāh was the Rājput question. During the civil war, both A'zam and Bahādur Shāh had bid for Rājput support. A'zam had granted to Ajit Singh and Jai Singh the titles of Maharaja and Mirza Raja, the ranks of 7000/7000, and the Governorships of Gujarāt and Malwa respectively. Jai Singh had joined A'zam Shāh in Malwa, but deserted him during the battle of Jājū.<sup>22</sup> However, he received no favour from Bahādur Shāh who had been joined by Vijai Singh, the younger brother of Jai Singh. Ajit Singh joined neither side, and took advantage of the civil war to expel the Mughal commander from Jodhpur. He did not attend the court, or send the customary congratulations to Bahādur Shāh on his accession to the throne. In Jodhpur, he was said to be "oppressing the Musalmans, forbidding the killing of cows, preventing the summons to prayer, razing the mosques which had been built after the destruction of idol-temples in the late reign, and repairing and building anew idol-temples". The Rana of Udaipur and Raja Jai Singh were said to be acting in close cooperation with him.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>21</sup> The title of the book was "Ilhāmūt-i-Mun'imī". According to Anand Ram Mukhlis, the real author of the book was the historian, Irādat Khān (see Hodiwala 667).

<sup>22</sup> M.M. 56b, Khalīl (Buhār Ms.) 6. A'zam-ul-Harb (331-4) says that he did this at the advice and instigation of his younger brother, Vijai Singh. But this seems unlikely, as relations between the two brothers were not good.

Hence, a war to punish Ajit Singh and to destroy his "coalition" was decided upon, and on October 9, 1707, Mihrāb Khān was appointed the faujdār of Jodhpur. The Emperor himself set out for Rājputānā on the 10th November, marching by way of Amber and Ajmer.<sup>24</sup>

Moving leisurely, the royal encampment reached Amber, the capital of Jai Singh, towards the end of January, 1708. Bahādur Shāh directed that as there was a dispute for the Kachhwāhā throne between the two brothers, Jai Singh and Vijai Singh, the state "should be confiscated to the Imperial establishment", that the name of the town should be changed to Islāmābād, and that a "new" faujdār should be sent there in the person of Saiyid Aḥmad Sa'īd Khān Bārahā.<sup>25</sup> The Emperor camped in Amber for three days during which the town was deserted by the inhabitants. The mutṣaddīs proceeded to confiscate the goods of Jai Singh, but these were returned to him soon after, and the kingdom was conferred on Vijai Singh.<sup>26</sup>

The exact purpose of Bahādur Shāh's action is not clear. It does not seem that he had any intention of establishing direct Mughal rule over Amber. He simply took advantage of a disputed succession to transfer the gaddī from one branch of the house which he distrusted, to another. Jai Singh had sided with A'zam in the civil war. Moreover, he was suspected of colluding with Ajit Singh in his "aggression" against Jodhpur.<sup>27</sup> Jai Singh's younger brother, Vijai Singh, on the other hand, had joined Bahādur Shāh at Kabul, and had rendered him good

23 K.K. 606.

24 B.N. 177, Akhbārāt.

25 B.N. 254-6, M.M. 56 a, Kāmwar 87 b, M.U. ii 500, Bahādur Shāh Nāmāh (Stewart) 317, Siyar 379, Khulāsat-ut-Tawārīkh of Kalyān Rāi (J.B.O. R.S. 1920) 20. See also Irvine i 47-8.

According to Akhbārāt March 1, 1708, the name of Amber was changed to Mominābād.

26 B.N. 254, 279, 288; M.U. ii 81,500-1; M.M. 56 a.

27 K.K. 605. B.N. (398) says, "Jai Singh had sided with Muḥammad A'zam and been a rebel and disturber. According to the laws of war and revenge, service at Jājū. But the state was not handed over to Vijai Singh at once. As was the usual procedure of the Mughals in such cases, it was first taken into Imperial custody or khālīṣah, so as to prevent local disturbances and to ensure a smooth change over.<sup>28</sup> As one contemporary writer says, "Saiyid Husain Khān Bārahā, faujdār of Mewar, was ordered to establish an imperial thana at Amber which was the seat of the Kachhwāhā Rajas, till the men of the Raja (Jai Singh) had been expelled from it".<sup>29</sup> However, even after the kingdom had been handed over to Vijai Singh, the capital of the state, Amber, continued to be garrisoned by the Imperial faujdār.<sup>30</sup>

[continued]

Thus, Bahādur Shāh's action in Amber closely resembles that it would have been proper to execute him, but the Emperor out of the kindness of his nature, (only) ordered that the zamindari of Amber should be confiscated from that infidel."

28 The actual words used by B.N., M.M. and M.U. are "dar sarkār-i-Shāhī zabt namūdah". This seems to have been used as an equivalent for the commoner expression "taken into khālīṣah". (For a discussion of the significance of khālīṣah see "Introduction" above). We have another instance from Farrukh Siyar's reign of the use of khālīṣah as a kind of Court of Wards. In 1715, when Jai Singh came to the court, Budh Singh was deprived of Bundi which was taken under khālīṣah, and then handed over to Bhim Singh (M.M. ff. 60).

29 M.M. 56 a.

30 M.M. 56 a, B.N. 288. Vijai Singh accompanied Bahādur Shāh in the campaign against Kām Bakhsh. When Ajit Singh and Jai Singh fled from the royal camp, the title of Mirza Raja was conferred upon him—perhaps as a kind of reaffirmation of his appointment to the gadāi of Amber. He had been granted the manṣab of 3000|2000—which was also the manṣab of Jai Singh—on Nov. 18, 1707. On Aug. 29, 1707, he was given a further rise of 500 ḡat. (B.N. 268,448).

Tod (ii 333) states that Vijai Singh was taken prisoner when Jai Singh retook Amber, and that after a long captivity, he was poisoned in 1729 for intriguing with the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn K., and Budh Singh Hārā.

However, the Akhbārāt make it clear that Vijai Singh was not a prisoner at least till the end of Bahādur Shāh's reign. He is mentioned as returning to the court after his marriage on July 6, 1710, and again, on Dec. 6, 1710, he was appointed to the army of Jahāndar Shāh, the eldest prince. He also took part in the siege of Sādhaurā. (Akhbārāt Jan. 14, 28, 1712; Khush-hāl 316).

of Aurangzīb in Jodhpur following the death of Jaswant Singh. His motives were probably similar, viz. a desire to gain greater control over Rājputānā and the trade routes passing through it. However, it was hardly likely that Bahādur Shāh would succeed where Aurangzīb had failed, and his action in Amber could only result in widening the breach with the Rājput Rajas.

As Bahādur Shāh advanced beyond Amber, Rana Amar Singh of Udaipur averted a threatened invasion of his country by sending his brother, Bakht Singh, to wait on the new Emperor with a letter of congratulations and, as nazr, one hundred gold coins, one thousand rupees, two horses with trappings mounted with gold, one elephant, nine swords, etc. Even then, such were his apprehensions that he fled from his capital and sent his family, property etc. into the hills as the Imperial army reached near his territories. But the Emperor graciously accepted his submission.

When Bahādur Shāh reached near Ajmer, peace offers were received from Ajit Singh, but they did not prove acceptable. Meanwhile, Mihrāb Khān, the faujdār-designate of Jodhpur, reached near Mertha, and after defeating an army under Ajit Singh, occupied the town.<sup>31</sup>

Farmāns were now sent to Durgadas and to Ajit Singh calling them to the court. Ajit Singh sent a reply professing submission, but entertaining doubts regarding the Emperor's intentions. Hence, Khān-i-Zamān, the son of Mun'im Khān, was sent to Jodhpur along with Raja Budh Singh Hārā and Najābat Khān, to meet and reassure Ajit Singh.<sup>32</sup>

On February 24, Ajit Singh formally surrendered to Bahādur Shāh at Mertha. He was graciously received, and restored to the manṣab of 3500/3000 which he had held during the previous reign, and was also granted the title of Maharaja, together with many other presents. Two of his sons were also granted manṣabs. At the same time, Qāzī Qāzī Khān and M. Ghaus Muftī were sent off "to re-establish Islām in Jodhpur".<sup>33</sup> In other words, the situation prevailing at the time of Aurangzīb's death was restored.

31 B.N. See also Irvine i 45-6.

32 Akhbārāt 6 Feb.. B.N.

33 B.N. 316.

Some modern historians have charged Bahādur Shāh with "treachery", and alleged that Mihrāb Khān was sent by "stealth" to occupy Jodhpur and that "Ajit burned with rage when he heard of it".<sup>34</sup> However, Khāfī Khān explicitly states that Ajit humbly agreed "that Khān-i-Zamān and Qāzī-ul-Quzzāt Qāzī Khān might come into Jodhpur to rebuild the mosques, destroy the idol-temples, enforce the provisions of the Shari'at about the summon to prayer and the killing of cows, to appoint magistrates, and to commission officers to collect jizyah". The author adds. "This 'request' was accepted and the sins of Ajit Singh were pardoned, and officials of justice like Qāzīs and Muftīs as well as Imāms and mu'azzins were sent to Jodhpur and neighbouring towns".<sup>35</sup>

Thus, it seems to be wrong to allege any breach of treaty by Bahādur Shāh. But there can be little doubt that Ajit Singh was not reconciled to the loss of Jodhpur. According to the official history of the reign, "Ajit Singh repeatedly petitioned for the restoration of Jodhpur, but because he harboured the intention of rebellion and disturbance in his heart, the Emperor, who comprehended all matters, did not grant his request".<sup>36</sup>

Due to his distrust of the Rājput, and in order to vindicate Imperial prestige, Bahādur Shāh decided to keep hold of Jodhpur. Jizyah was also levied there.<sup>37</sup> Worse still, Ajit Singh and Jai Singh were kept in a state of semi-captivity in the Imperial camp while the Emperor 34 Tod. ii 905, V. Reu "Hist. of Jodhpur" 295. V.V. 834 says that Ajit was offered the pargana of Sojat but refused to accept it without Jodhpur.

35 K.K. 606-7.

36 B.N. 398.

37 K.K. 606. Tod (i. 419) quotes from a Persian paper, stipulating a treaty between the Rana of Mewar and the Emperor that "the Jizyah shall be abolished—that it shall no longer be imposed on the Hindu nation: at all events that none of the Chagtai race sanction it in Mewar." Tod places this just before the death of Rana Amar Singh which, however, he wrongly assigns to the year 1716 (correct date, 10 Dec., 1710). As jizyah was definitely abolished by the year 1713, such a pact could only have been signed by Bahādur Shāh, if at all, in 1708 or in 1710, when he was returning from the Deccan.

Keene (Turks in India, 184) who thinks that the agreement included marched to the south to deal with Kām Bakhsh. However, on April 30, 1708, when the royal camp arrived at Mahābalēshwar on the Narmada, the two Rajas effected their escape. For the moment, Bahādur Shāh deemed the matter of Kām Bakhsh more important, and refrained from ordering a pursuit.<sup>38</sup>

[continued]

This, in effect, constituted a breakdown of the Rājput policy so far pursued by Bahādur Shāh, apparently at the instance of Mun'im Khān. Mirzā Muḥammad, a contemporary writer, sharply criticizes Mun'im Khān, and denounces this policy as "ill-conceived". "They (Ajit and Jai Singh) should have been given assurances and concessions", he opines. "But the wazīr, Mun'im Khān, remained oblivious of this. Rather, he advised His Majesty that they should be put off with sweet words and empty promises, while their countries were to be handed over to the charge of Imperial officers, and that they should be induced to remain at the court in the hope of obtaining large jāgīrs and their affairs prolonged till the action against Kām Bakhsh was over. Whatever was deemed suitable could then be done. In the meantime, Rājput resistance would have been crushed and their strength sapped".<sup>39</sup>

After effecting their escape, Jai Singh and Ajit Singh proceeded to Udaipur, where they made an agreement with the Maharana for joint resistance to the Mughals. If the Rājput tradition be accepted, the Rājput Rajās planned not only to recover their countries, but to expel the Mughal influence from Rājputānā completely, and even dreamt of bringing the entire Hindustan under their sway.<sup>40</sup> the abandonement of cow-slaughter, jizyah and doli (marriage with Rājput princesses) probably bases himself on Tod.

However, contemporāry Persian sources do not lend support to Tod's account.

38 M.M. 57 a, Wārid 152, Khush-hāl 32.

39 M.M. 56 b.

40 According to Rājput tradition, it was proposed at the conference that the Rana should be made the Emperor of Hindustan after turning out the Mughals from India, but Ajit Singh claimed the throne for himself, and so the matter was dropped (V.V. ii 767).

K.K. (619-20) says that one Saif Khān had formed an agreement with the Rājputs for the supply of 17-18,000 Rājput horsemen to Kām Bakhsh for making a sudden descent on Delhi while Bahādur Shāh was in the Deccan. But the proposal was rejected by Kām Bakhsh.

After dispersing, Ajit Singh attacked and occupied Jodhpur, and Jai Singh recovered Amber. They then over-ran the Mughal out-posts in Hindaun and Bayānā.

When the news of this Rājput outbreak reached the Emperor, he ordered Asad Khān, the Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq, to march from Delhi to Agra, and to take steps to repress the disturbance. A number of well known warriors and generals, including Chīn Qulīch (Khān-i-Daurān) the ṣūbahdār of Awadh, Khān-i-Jahān, the ṣūbahdār of Allahabad, and M. Amīn Khān, the faujdār of Moradabad were appointed to help him. But these nobles never marched. Instead, Asad Khān and Zū'lfīqār Khān, who did not apparently agree with Mun'im Khān's Rājput policy, opened negotiations with Jai Singh and Ajit Singh.<sup>41</sup>

Meanwhile, the rainy season of 1708 was over. The Rājput armies attacked the environs of Ajmer, and besieged the town for eleven days before they were repulsed by the ṣūbahdār, Saiyid Shujā'at Khān Bārahā. Next, they invaded Sāmbar. In a battle, the noted warrior, Saiyid Ḥusain Khān, was accidentally killed, and this gave the Rājputs a notable victory. But they made little progress elsewhere, and contented themselves mostly with plundering.<sup>42</sup>

Even this limited success of the Rājputs was a blow to Imperial prestige. Mirzā Muḥammad exclaims bitterly: "If one of the old grandees with a tried and tested following had been nominated the ṣūbahdār of Ajmer, and two brave and well known officers fully equipped with all necessary materials put in charge of Jodhpur, what courage had the Rājputs to win back their countries.....Saiyid Ḥusain Khān Bārahā was a brave and courageous man, but he was a newly risen noble and did not possess the confidence of people, or have sufficient means at his disposal (to cope with the situation)".<sup>43</sup>

On October 6, 1708, the Rājput Rajas were restored to their manṣabs at the instance of Asad Khān and Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān who was then the favourite of his father.<sup>44</sup> But the question of

<sup>41</sup> V.V. ii 768. See also Irvine i 67-70.

<sup>42</sup> B.N. 421-58, Akhbārāt April 10, 1709, V.V. 772-82.

<sup>43</sup> M.M. 57 a.

<sup>44</sup> In December, Asad Khān reported that the Rājput affair had ended. The Emperor was pleased, and remarked—"Well done! In reality, it is Asad Khān who is governing Hindustan." (Akhbārāt 3 Dec. 1708).

returning their capitals (watan jāgīr) was not decided. Asad Khān, who had been put in supreme charge of the provinces of Lahore, Delhi and Ajmer, offered to grant sanads of their homelands to the Rajas "provided they raised their thanas from Sāmbhar and Didwana, and accepted appointment to the provinces of Kabul and Gujarāt". But the Rajas were not willing to be separated, or to accept appointments far away from their homes, and asked for the posts of the ṣubahdārs of Malwa and Gujarāt.<sup>45</sup>

In February 1709, after defeating Kām Bakhsh, Bahādur Shāh once more turned his attention towards Rājputānā. An uneasy truce had prevailed there since October 1708, following the restoration of the Rajas to their manṣabs.<sup>46</sup> It appears that a powerful section at the court was in favour of a stern policy towards the Rājput̃s. Hence, Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang was appointed to Ajmer, and directed to march to his charge immediately from Ahmadabad.<sup>47</sup> It was also reported that the Emperor was returning "resolved to lead an army to punish and chastise the Rājput̃s". In alarm, the Rājput̃s sought the mediation of their old friends, Asad Khān and Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān.<sup>48</sup>

The intervention of these powerful figures, combined with the news of a Sikh uprising in the Punjab, tipped the scales in favour of a compromise. The report of the Sikh uprising was received by the Emperor near the Narmada, in December, 1709.<sup>49</sup> This was followed, soon afterwards, by the report of the death of Wazīr Khān, the faujdār of Sarhind, at the hands of Banda's followers. The possible consequences of a popular uprising such as that of the Sikhs, in close proximity to the Imperial capital and the strategic North-western area, were 45 Jaipur Records: Wakīl's reports d. June 28, 30, and July 12, 1709 (O.S.).

46 On April 10, 1709, Shujā'at Khān, the Governor of Ajmer, reported that Ajit Singh had launched an attack (Akhbārāt).

47 On Oct. 17, 1708. Shujā'at Khān Bārahā was replaced by S. 'Abdullāh K. The latter made a number of demands which were accepted. But Shujā'at Khān was restored soon afterwards.

On April 12, 1708, Fīruz Jang was made the absentee Governor of Ajmer. He was dismissed shortly afterwards, and re-appointed on 25 Rabī' I June 15 (Akhbārāt, Kāmwar, Lko. Ms., 93 b).

48 V.V. 781-84.

49 Akhbārāt entry d. 4 Rabī' I yr. 4 | May 4, 1710.

considered to be more dangerous than the pending quarrel with the Rājput̃s. The latter were old allies of the Mughals and, as one author observes, "had been used to obey (the Mughal Emperor) for generations". It was not considered likely that they would committ further aggression if left in possession of their hereditary lands.<sup>50</sup>

Hence, a settlement was hurriedly patched up with the Rājput̃ Rajas. Their homelands were returned to them, and their demand for an audience with the Emperor on the march (sar-i-sawārī, i.e. not in the court), to which they were to be escorted by Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān was accepted. It was further agreed that they would be given six months leave immediately after their audience with the Emperor, after which they would serve wherever appointed. On June 21, 1710, while the Emperor was on the march, the two Rajas were presented before him by Mahabāt Khān, the son of Mun'im Khān. After the customary greetings and presents, they were immediately given six months leave to return home.<sup>51</sup>

These terms, which one contemporary writer declares as "far above their status",<sup>52</sup> and another as "inconsistent with good policy as well as the dignity of the sovereign",<sup>53</sup> could really be only a first step in a sound policy aimed at the reconciliation of the Rājput̃s. Bahādur Shāh was keen that the Rājput̃s should serve against the Sikhs and, presumably, against the Marāthās as well. In other words, he wanted them to act as the sword arm of the Mughal Empire as before. But for such a policy to succeed, an attitude of magnanimity, and not crude suspicion was required. The Rājput̃ Rajas wanted not only the restoration of their homelands but that they should be granted high manṣabs as before, and appointed as ṣūbahdārs of important provinces like Malwa and Gujarāt.<sup>54</sup> These two provinces adjoined their homelands as well as each other, and in their prevailing mood of distrust, the two Rajas seem to have considered appointment to the 51 M.M. 58 b, K.K. 661. Elliot's translation (Vol. vii 420) is really only a summary of the original passage.

50 Irādat 67.

53 Irādat 68.

53 M.M. 58b, Irādat 68.

54 V.V. 949 (Wakīl's report).

charge of these provinces as a guarantee of good faith on the part of the Emperor.

The Rājput affairs remained in this condition during the remaining years of Bahādur Shāh's reign. Mun'im Khan was not inclined to accept the demands of the Rājput Rajas for appointment as the governors of Malwa and Gujarāt. He urged them to accept, instead, appointment to Kabul and Gujārat. 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, who posed as the friend of the Rājputs, promised them appointment "to the east—or leave to return home if that was not acceptable," after the Rajas had come to the court.<sup>55</sup> But the Rājput Rajas were not enthusiastic about either of these proposals, and hence they delayed in making their appearance at the court. It was only in October 1711, after repeated summons, and the lapse of more than fifteen months after they had secured six months leave that the two Rajas arrived at the court to render service.<sup>56</sup> Mun'im Khān was dead by this time, and prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān had become the centre of all the affairs. The Rajas were appointed to Sādhaurā, and served there with "a large army", guarding the foot-hills from the raids of Banda's followers.<sup>57</sup>

After two and a half months, Jai Singh was made the faujdār of Aḥmadabad Khorā alias Chitrakūt, and Ajit Singh of Sorath in Gujarāt.<sup>58</sup> These fell far short of Rājput expectations,<sup>59</sup> and they

<sup>55</sup> V.V. 948.

<sup>56</sup> The two Rajas reached Sādhaurā on 5 Ramaṣān Yr. 5|Oct. 17, 1711 (J.R. Misc. papers Vol. i 217, Akhbārāt entries d. 11 and 15 Ramaṣān|Oct. 23, 27, M.M. 39a).

They reached Mertha in Dec. 1710, but nine months later, they were still at Karnal. They had come with a considerable army and in spite of their assurances, the local people began to flee in panic. Near Delhi, the Rajas hunted in the imperial preserves, which caused much annoyance to the Emperor, but he discreetly kept silent. (V.V. 948, 786, 924, 943; Akhbārāt 15 Muh., 26 Rabī II, 22 Jam. I, 8 Jam. II, 8 Sha'bān, Yr. 5|March 5, June 14, July 9 and 24, Sept. 21, 1711).

<sup>57</sup> Akhbārāt 1 Zīqā'dah|11 Dec. 1711. The Guru threatened reprisals against the Rajas, who retaliated by proclaiming in their camps that any Sikh found there would be executed.

<sup>58</sup> Akhbārāt 10, 12, 21 Shawwāl|22, 24 Nov., 3 Dec. 1711. In a letter of petitioned for permission to return home. In keeping with his promise, the Emperor agreed to this, but with the proviso that they should leave a chauki behind, and in January 1712, the Rajas started back for their homes.<sup>60</sup>
[continued]

Thus, the Rājput policy of Bahādur Shāh underwent a definite evolution. He attempted, at first, to maintain Mughal control over Jodhpur by force of arms, and even to extend the Mughal hold on Rājputānā by displacing Jai Singh from the gaddi of Amber in favour of his younger brother, and stationing an Imperial faujdār at Amber. This led to a serious uprising in Rājputānā when Bahādur Shāh went to the Deccan to fight Kām Bakhsh. Pressed by circumstances and by a strong party at the court which favoured the conciliation of the Rājputs, Bahādur Shāh restored their capitals and homelands to Jai Singh and Ajit Singh, but refused still to accord the Rajas such manṣabs and offices as they coveted.

Thus, the gulf with the Rājputs was narrowed but not bridged.

iii The Deccan Problem.

The Deccan problem, as has been emphasised earlier, was amongst the major problems that the Mughals had to face since the beginning of the 17th century, and Bahādur Shāh could not long remain indifferent to it. The problem may be regarded as being a twofold one—the problem of the predominantly Marāthi-speaking areas on the western coast in which Shivāji had demanded independence (swarajya), and, secondly, the problem of the plateau extending upto Mysore—a rich and fertile area which had been frequently plundered by the armies from the North, but which had rarely been ruled effectively from instructions bearing Asad Khān's seal and dated 7 Shawwāl 17 Nov., 1711, Jai Singh is asked to punish thieves and to destroy their forts, forbid blacksmiths of the place to make match-locks, realize mālguzārī prevent the thanadars from exacting illegal cesses, forbid intoxicants, keep the royal highways safe for travellers, etc..

59 c]f the remark of Aurangzīb in one of his letters that the faujdārī of Sorath was not an inferior thing, and that formerly persons of the rank of 5000 were appointed to it. (Raḡ'īm ff. 9 a-b).

60 Akhbārūt 13 Zilhijjah Yr. 5|15 Jan. 1712; Reu's Marwar 303.

Northern India. The Mughals had cast covetous eyes on the riches of this area for a long time, but a sustained effort to bring it under direct Mughal rule started only from about 1676. Since the time of Shivaji, the Marāthās had been claiming and levying chauth and sardeshmukhi from this area, which amounted to 35% of the total revenue.

At the time of Bahādur Shāh accession, the problem was complicated by the presence in the Deccan of a royal competitor, Kām Bakhsh, who had struck coins and had the khuṭbah read in his name, thus proclaiming his independence. Aurangzīb had over-run the Deccan plateau, and extinguished the independent states existing there. In order to meet the two-fold problem of establishing a sound administrative system in those parts, and of overcoming the Marāthā opposition, Aurangzīb had spent the last twenty-six years of his life in the Deccan. But due to difficulties which have been discussed earlier he could achieve only limited success. With his death, the problem became all the more difficult of solution. The nobles were already restive at their prolonged stay in the Deccan away from Northern India which the large majority of them regarded as their home. A new monarch was not likely to have sufficient authority to compel them to prolong their stay in the Deccan much longer. Besides, continued concentration on the Deccan was liable to have serious repercussion on northern India the resources of which formed the mainstay of the Mughal Empire.

The scheme for the partition of Empire ascribed to Aurangzīb was apparently aimed at providing a solution to the twin problems of securing the extension of the Mughal Empire to the entire country and, at the same time, setting up in the Deccan a local administration strong enough to counter the Marāthā depredations. Under the scheme, the country was divided into three parts: the first, consisting of Bijāpur and Golkonda was assigned to Kām Bakhsh; the second, consisting of the remaining four ṣūbahs of the Deccan and of Malwa, Gujarāt and Agra was assigned to A'zam Shāh, and the third, consisting of the rest of the Empire was assigned to Bahādur Shāh.<sup>61</sup>

61 B.M. Add. 18,881, f 76 b, and I.O.L., MS. 1334, f 49 b.

On the eve of the battle of Jājū, Bahādur Shāh had offered to abide by the provisions of this will. He now made a similar offer to Kām Bakhsh. "Our father entrusted to you the ṣūbah of Bījāpur," he wrote to Kām Bakhsh in a letter sent through Ḥāfiẓ Aḥmad Muftī alias Ma'tbar Khān. "We now relinquish to you the two ṣūbah of Bījāpur and Ḥaiderābād with all subjects and belongings, upon the condition according to the old rules of the Dakin, that the coins shall be struck and the khutbah read in our name. The tribute which has hitherto been paid by the governors of the two provinces we remit. You should do justice to the people, punish the disobedient, and expel the robbers and oppressors from that area".<sup>62</sup>

It is not easy to decide if Bahādur Shāh was sincere in his offer. He may have hoped that the old kingdoms of Bījāpur and Golkonda, united under a Timurid prince, would be able to maintain internal law and order and, at the same time, provide an effective check to the Marāthās.<sup>63</sup> Such a kingdom would also not conflict with the principle of Hamīd-ud-dīn Khān gives a different will (Translated by Sarkar in Anecdotes of Aurangzeb, 46-49).

English Factory Records also mention the alleged will making the division (see I.H.R.C. Proceedings, Vol. XVIII, 1942, p. 338).

<sup>62</sup> K.K. 608, Irādat 54, Ḥadīqat 11, B.N. 386-90, Kāmwar 88 b.

Siyar 376-77 says that A'zam had made a similar agreement with Kām Bakhsh, giving him Ḥaiderabad in addition to Bījāpur in return for khutbah and sikkah in his name. But this may be doubted, in view of the extremely strained relations between the two brothers. According to some accounts, Kām Bakhsh had wished to join A'zam but his offer was refused (K.K. 567-70).

Mr. Wigmore wrote from Madras on Jan. 8, 1708—"Cawn Bux remains yet possessed of Vijapore, and Shaw Allum they say, is willing he should continue so, but his sons will not consent to it". (Factory letters in J.H.R.C. Proceedings, Vol. XVIII, 330).

<sup>63</sup> c/f the view of J.D.B. Gribble (History of the Deccan, 1898, ii 337): "The Deccan under one Prince, who was also a member of the Imperial family, and acknowledged by and allied to the Emperor himself, would before long have developed into a strong and homogenous kingdom extending from sea to sea, and from the Vindhya to Cape Kamorin. Such a kingdom was the only possible means of subduing the Marathas, and by it the disjointed Hindoo Kingdom of the South would have been conquered without difficulty. It is probable that the course been far different if, when some 40 years an all-India Timurid monarchy. But the scheme could not be given a trial at all, for Kām Bakhsh scornfully rejected Bahādur Shāh's offer. This enabled the latter to cast on the head of Kām Bakhsh the onus of shedding the blood of innocent Muslims.<sup>64</sup>

[continued]

If Kām Bakhsh had taken effective possession of all the important forts and fortresses in the provinces of Bījāpur and Golkonda, secured the support and confidence of his nobles, and reached some kind of an understanding with the Marāthās he would have posed a serious threat to Bahādur Shāh. Kām Bakhsh did make approaches to the Marāthās, but with little success. He failed to bring the Karnātak under his control due to the opposition of Dā'ūd Khān, the deputy of Zu'lfīqār Khān. In the north, the commandant of Golkonda, Nazr Beg Khān, who was in touch with Bahādur Shāh, refused to submit to him.<sup>65</sup> Most of the other nobles also sought to reinsure themselves by entering into secret correspondence with Bahādur Shāh. Matters were made worse by Kām Bakhsh's suspicious bent of mind which led him to unjustly entertain doubts about the loyalty of Taqarrub Khān, the Mir Bakhshī, and one of his most energetic officers. Hence, he imprisoned Taqarrub Khān and executed him along with a number of his adherants.<sup>66</sup>

The result of all these was that the officers and men of Kām Bakhsh deserted him in large numbers as Bahādur Shāh approached near, till Kām Bakhsh was left with only a small, dispirited following. Deeming flight to be dishonourable, he put up a desperate but futile resistance, and died fighting on the battle field (January 13, 1709).

later the English began to take active interest in the political affair of South India, they had come in contact with a strongly established Muslim Kingdom of the Deccan".

64 The charge brought against Kām Bakhsh by the official historian, Dānishmand Khān, is that "he collected an army of infidels and plundered the Imperial territories which had no connection with him". (B.N. 385).

65 Bahādur Shāh had made various attempts to retain Haiderābād by granting concessions to the Governor, Rustam Dil Khān (B.N. 130). On 7 April, the ṣūbahdārī of the Deccan was offered to 'Aẓīm-ush Shān (B.N. 257). As no reply had been received from Kām Bakhsh till then, this suggests that Bahādur Shāh was either not sincere about his offer, or felt confident that Kām Bakhsh would reject it.

66 For these and other doings of Kām Bakhsh, see K.K. 605-21.

In this way, the civil war which had kept parts of the country in an unsettled state for almost two years, finally ended with the victory of Bahādur Shāh who now ruled over one of the most extensive empires ever ruled by an Indian king. The victory of Bahādur Shāh strengthened the idea of an all-India monarchy, and implied the defeat, for the time being, of the forces of regional separatism. The idea of the political unity of the country remained one of the cardinal political beliefs in the country, and effected, in some degree or the other, all political movements which developed in the country during the 18th century. For instance, it found expression in the continued acceptance of the Mughal king as the Emperor of India even when all power and glory had departed from him.

Bahādur Shāh had next to make suitable arrangements for the administration of the Deccan. At first, the post of the Viceroy of the six ṣūbahs of the Deccan was offered to Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, who had been gradually gaining favour with him. However, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān preferred the charge of the Eastern provinces—Bengal, Bihar Orissa, and Allahabad, some of which he had governed during Aurangzīb's lifetime. The post was therefore conferred upon Zū'lfiqār Khān. He was granted full authority in all the revenue and administrative matters pertaining to the Deccan, and allowed to remain at the court and to combine his new appointment with his previous post of Mir Bakhshī. His old associate and protégé, Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, was made his deputy in the Deccan, and granted the manṣab of 7000/5000 (5000 dū-aspah), and the Governorship of Bījāpur, Berar and Aurangabad, the latter being fixed as his headquarters.<sup>68</sup>

By virtue of holding two such important posts as those of the Mir Bakhshī and the (absentee) Viceroy of the Deccan, Zū'lfiqār Khān became one of the most powerful nobles in the empire. Previous to this, the Mughal Emperors had never permitted one person to hold two such posts, whatever may have been the exigencies of the situation. The new departure was a dangerous portent for the future. Moreover, Zu'lfīqār Khān was not prepared to tolerate any interference in the revenue or any other matter pertaining to the Deccan. It appears that Mun'im Khān was opposed to the grant of such wide powers to Zu'lfīqār Khān. He put forward the argument that the province of Burhānpur (Khandesh) and half of Berar generally known as Pā'in-Ghat, did not form a part of the Deccan, because Khandesh had been a part of the independent kingdom of the Fārūkīs, and Pā'in-Ghat had been annexed by Akbar. He wanted to include these ṣūbahs in the provinces dependent on Delhi, and to vest the authority over the political and revenue affairs, and the appointment, dismissal and transfer of officers in those areas in the hands of his eldest son, Mahābat Khān, who held the post of the third Bakhshī. This caused further bitterness between Mun'im Khān and Zu'lfīqār Khān, and the dispute reached such heights that it became the common talk of the camp. As Bahādur Shāh disliked taking decisions in matters involving disputes between nobles, the prevailing situation apparently continued.<sup>69</sup>

<sup>67</sup> Akhbārāt 24 Oct. 1708. Zū'lfiqār was appointed on 4 Zīqa'dah |15 Jan. 1709, though a formal farmān was not issued till 10 Muḥ. Yr. 3 |15 March 1709.

(Copy in "Sarkar's Collection", vol. XIV 319-20).

<sup>68</sup> Siyar 380.

Thus, Zu'lfīqār Khān remained the Viceroy of the Deccan with sole authority over its affairs. Only one instance will suffice to illustrate the power and authority enjoyed by Zu'lfīqār Khān. Upon his advocacy and support, Nīmājī Sindhia, who was "one of the most considerable nā-sardars of those parts" was raised to the manṣab of 7000/5000, and the manṣabs granted to his sons and grandsons at the same time came altogether to 40,000 zāt, 25,000 sawār. Many parganas in the settled parts of Aurangabad were transferred to him, displacing more than 1000 manṣabdārs, big and 69 K.K. ii 626-27. Zu'lfīqār Khān's dīwān in the Deccan was Diyānat Khān Khwāfī, the son of the ex-dīwān of the Deccan, Amānat Khān. At the instance of Mun'im Khān, Diyānat K. was, at first, superseded and Murshid Qulī Khān, the dīwān of Bengal, was appointed to succeed him. It seems that Mun'im Khān wanted to use Murshid Qulī as a check upon Zu'lfīqār Khān, Murshid Qulī was not keen to accept the appointment, and soon, by the exertions of Zu'lfīqār Khān, Amānat Khān was made the dīwān of the Deccan once again, and Diyānat Khān was made his deputy. Thus, Zu'lfīqār Khān remained supreme in the affairs of the Deccan.

(B.N. entries d. Oct. 18, 1707, Jan. 25, 1708; M.U. ii 70-73).

small. In spite of considerable clamour and opposition, these measures of Z̤u'lfiqār Khān could not be reversed.<sup>70</sup>

There can be little doubt that the delegation of large powers to the Viceroy of the Deccan, or to his deputy was an administrative necessity. But in the background of the growing feebleness of the central government, and the persistence of strong separatist tendencies in the Deccan, this served to stoke the fires of ambition in the breasts of powerful nobles who were already casting covetous eyes on the Deccan. Along with the posts of wazīr and Mīr Bakhshī, the post of the Viceroy of the Deccan became one of the chief prizes in the struggle between parties and factions at the court.

The big test of the new Viceroy's authority and influence was his ability to secure a settlement of the Marāthā question along lines favoured by him. But here he found it much more difficult to have his own way. After the defeat of Kām Bakhsh, Z̤u'lfiqār Khān introduced Shāhū's wakīl to the Emperor. He presented an application for the grant of the chauth and sardeshmukhi for the six ṣūbahs of the Deccan on condition of restoring prosperity to the ruined land. At the same time, Mun'im Khān presented the wakīl of Tārā Bāi, praying for a farmān in the name of her son, Shivaji II. She asked only for sardeshmukhi without any reference to chauth, and also offered to suppress other insurgents and to restore order in the country. A great contention upon the matter arose between the two ministers. In the end, Bahādur Shāh, who was unwilling to displease either side, ordered that sanads for sardeshmukhi be given in compliance with the requests of both Mun'im Khān and Z̤u'lfiqār Khān.<sup>71</sup> In other words, he refused to recognise Shāhū as the rightful Marāthā king, as had been done all along by Aurangzīb. He also rejected the claim for chauth. Only sardeshmukhi was granted, and even for that the rival claimants were left to fight it out. This was a negation of the policy of giving first priority to the task of restoring peace and order in the Deccan, for in fighting each other, both sides were only too likely to plunder the Mughal territories. In fact, that is what did happen. Bahādur Shāh had no sooner left the Deccan than Shāhū came out of Raigarh and issued an order to his sardars: "The Emperor has granted me the (sar) deshmukhi of these parts, but not yet the chauth. You should therefore, raid the Imperial territories and create disorder there (till he agrees to do so)".<sup>72</sup>

<sup>70</sup> B.N. 456, 460, 462; K.K. 625-6. This happened in Sept. 1709.

<sup>71</sup> K.K. 627, 783, Duff i 421, Tārīkh-i-Ibrāhīmī, Elliot viii, 259, Khazānah 42. M.U. ii 351 says that Bahādur Shāh granted 10% as sardeshmukhi out of the total collections of (only the five) ṣūbahs of Aurangabad, Khandesh, Berar, Bījāpur and Bīdar.

It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Bahādur Shāh's Marāthā policy was short-sighted and ill-conceived. He was really called upon to choose between the advice of the wazīr who was the chief counsellor in matters political, and that of the Viceroy of the Deccan whose special responsibility was the Deccan, including the Marāthās affairs. By rejecting the advice of Zū'lfīqār Khān he threw away a golden chance of settlement with the Marāthās. The Marāthā power was then at its lowest ebb. Shāhū's position was insecure at home, and if Bahādur Shāh had extended recognition to him, he could have gained Shāhū's gratitude and friendship. Besides, Shāhū's succession had always been favoured by Aurangzīb, and on coming to the throne, Bahādur Shāh himself had tacitly recognised this claim by restoring Shāhū to his former manṣab, sending him a farmān and other presents in acknowledgement of his congratulations on his succession,<sup>73</sup> and calling upon him to render military help against Kām Bakhsh.<sup>74</sup>

As for the terms to be offered to the Marāthās, Zū'lfīqār Khān who was a man of wide experience and well acquainted with Marāthā character and politics, seems to have been of the opinion that a policy of half-hearted concessions was of no use. He apparently felt that the 72 Akhbārāt, 21 Rajab yr. 3|21 Sept. 1709.

73 Akhbārāt 15 Oct. 1707, B.N. 114, Kāmwar 86a, M.U. ii 342.

Riyasat 23 and Sinha (Rise of the Peshwas) xv wrongly think that Shāhū was given the rank of 10,000|10,000. All ranks of 10,000 and above were reserved for the Princes.

Further presents to Shāhū were sent on 24 Dec. (Akhbārāt).

74 Shāhū had expressed his inability to attend in person, but sent one of his best known sardars, Nīmājī, with a large force, which did good service. (K.K. 625, Rajwade viii No. 56, Duff i 420).

time was ripe for a bold and far-reaching reorientation of policy in the Deccan with the object of making the Marāthās partners in the empire from opponents, and of utilising their military and administrative talents for the maintenance of peace and order in the Deccan by giving them a stake in its prosperity and good governance.

Soon after Bahādur Shāh's departure, news was received of Marāthā depredations in the ṣūbahs of Burhānpur, Bījāpur and Aurangabad. A large band of Marāthās entered the ṣūbah of Bījāpur in 1710, and moved in the direction of Ahmadnagar. Rustam Khān Bījāpurī, the Governor, who held the rank of 8000/8000, moved against them, but they eluded battle. When this news reached Bahādur Shāh, he reduced the rank of Rustam Khān by 1000 as a mark of displeasure, but soon relented, and appointed the Khan to Berar in addition to his former charge. Meanwhile, another band of Marāthās invaded Burhānpur, and plundered upto the outskirts of the capital. The Governor, Mīr Amīn Khān, came out to fight, but was completely surrounded by the Marāthās. The Khan put up a desperate fight but perished in the course of the battle, while two of his sons were wounded. Another band of Marāthās appeared near Aurangabad and plundered the inhabitants of the surrounding areas. The deputy Viceroy, Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, took the field against them, but the Marāthās refused to give battle and moved away at his approach. By this time, the rainy season was approaching and campaigning came to an end.<sup>75</sup>

After the rains, the Marāthās appeared in force once again. Chandrasen Jādhav besieged the fort of Vijaydurg, and then moved on to Kulbargā; Haibat Rao Nimbālkar, along with Sōmā, Jagannāth etc. invaded Bījāpur but was chased out of the ṣūbah by Hīrāman, the deputy of Dā'ūd Khān. Gangā, one of the dismissed sardars of Fīrūz Jang, created widespread disturbances in Malwa and Burhānpur. A body of 40,000 Marāthās raided the Junnair area under the instructions of Shāhū, and looted the jāgīrs of Zū'lfīqār Khān.<sup>76</sup> The Mughals

Earlier, on his way back after escaping from captivity, Shāhū had demonstrated his loyalty by ostentatiously visiting the tomb of Aurangzīb near Daulatabad. (K.K. 583).

<sup>75</sup> Akhbārāt Feb. 8, 19, April 24, June; K.K. 666.

<sup>76</sup> Akhbārāt: Aug. 1710 to March 1711.

were apparently powerless to check these inroads, though Dā'ūd Khān Pannī moved about with a large army, chasing the Marāthās. He took over charge from Rustam Khān who had repeatedly failed against them, chased out Santā Ghōrpādē from Khandesh and made sound arrangements for its defence, and sent his nephew, Alāwal Khān, to look after Berar. He also tried to sow dissensions among the Marāthās by his diplomacy. Towards the end of 1710, Rao Rambhā Nimbālkar joined the Mughals. He was welcomed into Aurangabad by Dā'ūd Khān who secured for him the manṣab of 7000/6000, and the rank of 5000 each for two of his lieutenants. The next to desert was Paimā Rāj Sindhia. The most important defection, however, was that of Chandrasen Jadhav who joined the Mughals in August 1711 after a clash with Bālāji Vishwanāth over a hunting incident, though he had been in contact with the Mughals even earlier.<sup>77</sup>

It was probably about this time that Dā'ūd Khān entered into a private pact with Shāhū. According to this pact, the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan was promised to Shāhū. However, it was not to be collected by the Marāthā agents, but by Dā'ūd Khān's deputy, Hīrāman, who would pay it to the Marāthās in a lump sum. The jāgīrs of the princes and the high grandees were to be exempt from any charge. No written confirmation of this agreement was given to the Marāthās,<sup>78</sup> but it could hardly have been made without the knowledge and active support of Zū'lfīqār Khūn, and the tacit consent of the Emperor.

The pact was a god-send to Shāhū for it bolstered up his prestige in Mahārāshtra at a time when he had reached the nadir of his career. But it failed to bring peace to the unfortunate Deccan. The agreement "gave birth to an infinity of bickerings and troubles, which always ended in some blood." "...the hands of the Marāthās stretched everywhere, their agents appeared in all places according to usage, and levied chauth".<sup>79</sup> In December, 1711, Mīr Aḥmad Khān, the Governor of Burhānpur, was killed in a fight against a band led by a woman, Tulsi Bai.<sup>80</sup> The Marāthās besieged Karnūl, Sholapur, Berinagar and many other places in the Karnātak. Aku Ghorpādē remained camping in the province with 70,000 men till he was chased across the river by Diler Khān and 'Abd-un-Nabī Khān. The depredations of the Marāthās gave opportunity to the zamindars who rose up everywhere, and the authority of the Mughals remained in name only in the Karnātak.<sup>81</sup>

77 Akhbārāt Aug. 1710 to March 1711. Chandrasen's wakūl was presented to Dā'ūd Khān as early as Jan. 1711.

78 K.K. 788, Rajwade viii 56. Duff. i 423 dates the agreement in 1709, but Riyasat 68 places it in March 1711. Most authorities are silent on the date. I prefer the latter date on internal grounds—the perceptible decline in the scale of Marāthā operations in the Deccan after 1711, and the fact that the death of Mun'im Khān in Feb. 1711 had left the field clear for Zū'lfīqār Khān's policies.

Dā'ūd Khān's pact constituted a fundamental departure from the policy of Aurangzīb. The Marāthā claim for the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan was conceded in substance, though not in form. But this did not bring to the Mughal empire the benefits that might have been expected, viz., peace in the Deccan, and the establishment of friendly relations with the Marāthās. A major reason for this was that the Marāthā king had ceased to have any real control over the Marāthā chiefs most of whom owed him only a tenuous allegiance and plundered largely on their own account. In other words, the forces of anarchy let loose in the Deccan as a result of the virtual destruction of the Marāthā state by Aurangzīb could not be controlled easily, or in a short time. Only the joint cooperation of the Mughal authority and the Marāthā king could bring the free-booting Marāthā chiefs under control once again. But past suspicions and Mughal arrogance stood in the path of such cooperation. The refusal of the Mughals to put the agreement for chauth and sardeshmukhi in writing served to keep suspicions alive, and emphasised the essentially temporary nature of the agreement. The intrigues of the Mughal officials in the Deccan with the domestic enemies of Shāhū also had an unsettling effect, and served to keep the Marāthā civil war going.

iv The Sikh Uprising

On May 4, 1710, when the Emperor was near the Narmada, news

<sup>79</sup> K.K. 738, 742.

<sup>80</sup> M.U. iii 764-65.

<sup>81</sup> Akḥbārāt Dec. 1711—July 1712.

was received from the diwān of Lahore of disturbances created by the Sikhs in the neighbourhood of Lahore and Sirhind under a man who gave himself out as Guru Govind. The Emperor ordered the various faujdārs to take suitable action, but the uprising spread rapidly, and on May 22, 1710, Wazīr Khān, the faujdār of Sirhind, was defeated and killed, and the town ravaged and plundered.<sup>82</sup>

With the help of the local hill Rajas and other (upper class) Hindu allies, and by relentless pressure Aurangzīb had been successful in crushing the rebellion of Guru Govind. But the underlying causes of the trouble had remained.<sup>83</sup> When Bahādur Shāh marched from Lahore to contest the throne with A'zam, Guru Govind joined him at the head of a small following, and received a mansab. The Guru was present at the battle of Jājū, and, afterwards, accompanied Bahādur Shah to Rājputānā and the Deccan. In November, 1708, it was reported that the Guru had died and left much property behind. There are many stories of the Guru's death, all of which ascribe it, however, to an assault following personal enmity. Bahādur Shāh forebore from applying the law of escheat to his property as he was "not in need of the property of a darvēsh".<sup>84</sup>

There was apparent peace in the Punjab till the beginning of the Sikh revolt a year and a half later under Banda who gave himself out as Guru Govind Singh. It was an age of superstition and the masses could easily be imposed upon. All contemporary authorities are agreed that the Guru drew his main support from the lower classes—the Jats and Khatri and "people of such ignoble professions as the scavengers and leather-dressers". Banda, the 'false guru,' amassed a following of 7000—8000 men with 4000—5000 ponies at first, but soon increased his strength to 17,000 and then to 40,000 well-armed men. The faujdārs of Sonpat and Sirhind and many others were defeated in 82 Akhbārāt 5 Rabī' I, 23 Rabī' I; Irvine i 96. The date 2 Rabī' ii 30 May given by Irvine (104) when news of the out-break first reached Bahādur Shāh is not correct.

83 See Introduction above.

84 Akhbārāt: entry d. 7 Ramāṣān Yr. 2 | 19 Nov. 1708. The traditional date of the Guru's death is 18th Oct. 1708. For the controversy regarding the Guru's death, see I. B. Banerji, "Evolution of the Khalsa", ii 147-52; Irvine i 90-91.

open battle, and the Sikhs besieged the towns of Sultanpur and Saharanpur, obtaining command of the whole area "from a few days march from Delhi to the outskirts of Lahore".<sup>85</sup> In this area, the Sikhs set up their own administration. They appointed their own thanedars and tahsildars to collect revenue, and appointed commandants in the towns they over-ran. Usually, these officers were chosen from the lower classes. "A low scavenger or leather-dresser had only to leave his home and join the Guru, when in a short space of time he would return to his birth-place with his order of appointment in his hand".<sup>86</sup>

Even after making the allowance for exaggeration in such statements, the character of the Sikh uprising as a specific form of a lower class movement seems undeniable. The Sikhs persecuted the upper class Hindus no less than the Muslims, and, in most places, the local Hindu zamindars and wealthy people sided with the Mughal government. But the Sikhs lacked any clear social and political objectives. The necessary economic basis for the creation of a new and higher social order was lacking. The most that the Sikhs could aim at was a rough kind of egalitarian society with a peasant-clan basis. Such an attempt was bound to evoke the hostility of the privileged classes, and hence, could only hope to succeed if it could rapidly mobilise a large and growing number of peasants. But the religious basis of the Sikh movement restricted its appeal, and made a more rapid growth of the movement difficult.

Consequently, the Imperialists were able to recover from their initial surprise, and to assume the counter-offensive against the Sikhs. Asad Khān was ordered to march against the Guru. Chīn Qulīch Khān, Muḥammad Amīn Khān Khān-i-Jahān the Governor of Allahabad, Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān Bārahā and many others were deputed to help him, and suitable advances were made to them for completing their preparations.<sup>87</sup> At the end of June, the Emperor left Ajmer and himself marched against the Sikhs. After opening the road between Delhi and Lahore which had been closed for many months, Bahādur

85 K.K. 660, 672.

86 Wārid 392, Irvine i 98.

87 Akhhbārāt June 28, July 6 and 9, 1710.

Shāh fixed his head-quarters at Sādhaurā near the foot-hills of the Himalayas where the Sikhs had built several forts for refuge. Lohgarh,<sup>88</sup> which had been built by Guru Govind, and where he and afterwards Banda lived in some sort of regal splendour, was stormed in December 1710. But the chief prize, Banda, got away. Bahādur Shāh blamed Mun'im Khān for his lack of care in allowing Banda to escape, and, according to some authorities, the fierce reproaches of the Emperor hastened the death of the wazīr.

After the escape of Banda from Lohgarh, Bahādur Shāh seems to have lost interest in the Sikh affairs. He returned to Lahore, leaving the Imperial armies to continue operations against Banda. Thereafter, desultory fighting continued, with the Imperial troops not advancing beyond the foot-hills and the Guru making occasional descents into the plains for purposes of plunder. The Imperial commanders, Rustam Dil and M. Amīn Khān, chased in vain after the Guru who adopted guerilla tactics and refused to face the Imperialists in a pitched battle. Evidently, the Guru had considerable local support in the plains. Thus, when he invaded the Baith Jālandhar, the Mughal commanders withdrew in panic, and the local Sikhs and their supporters seized the opportunity to slaughter the Mughal stragglers, and put their own armed posts in the towns of Batālā and Kālānaur and in the surrounding villages. When the Imperial armies re-established their sway, they took drastic action against the Sikhs and their sympathisers, many of the innocent suffering with the guilty.<sup>89</sup>

There was a spy scare in the royal camp itself where many people were suspected of being Sikhs secretly and of passing on information to the Guru. Hence, an order was issued that all Hindus should shave their beards.<sup>90</sup> Hindu faqīrs, jogis and sanyāsīs who were suspected of spying for the Guru were also expelled from the royal camp.<sup>91</sup>

88 Situated half-way between Nāhan and Sādhaurā. Islām Shāh, son of Sher Shāh, had begun to build a fort here under the name of Pāwāgarh. It was left unfinished at his death: the ruins remained till Banda restored and extended them. (Imp. Gazetteer).

89 Kāmwar, Irvine i 119.

90 Kāmwar, Akhbārāt 23 Jam. II|19 Aug. 1710.

91 Akhbārāt 27, Ramāṣān Yr. 5|9 Nov. 1711.

Inspite of these precautions and efforts and the presence of the Emperor, the operations against the Guru were not very fruitful. One cause of this was the mutual jealousies and quarrels of the two Mughal commanders, which led to the disgrace and imprisonment of Rustam Dil in September, 1711. In January, 1712, when the Emperor died, M. Amīn abandoned his post to take part in the civil war at Lahore, and the Guru, seizing his opportunity, recovered Sādhaurā and Lohgarh.<sup>92</sup>

Thus, inspite of concentrating large armies and the best generals in the Punjab for a year and a half, Bahādur Shāh failed to crush the Sikh uprising. The basic cause of this must be considered not so much the weakness of the Imperialists as the nature of the Sikh uprising and the tactics of the Guru. The Sikhs once again proved the truth demonstrated earlier by the Marāthās and the Rājputs that an army enjoying the support of the local population, making skilful use of the terrain, and led by commanders who followed the methods of guerilla-warfare could hold out against a much superior enemy, if not indefinitely, then at least for a long time.

The Sikh movement assumed the character of a struggle for an independent Sikh state. If the attempt had succeeded, it would have given impetus to similar movements elsewhere, and largely altered the political picture of the eighteenth century.

v. Death of Mun'im Khān—Beginning of the Struggle for Wizārat

As has been stated earlier, Zū'lfīqār Khān looked upon Mun'im Khān as an interloper and was keen to regain the office of wazīr for his family. On February 28, 1711, Mun'im Khān died after a short illness. His death once more brought the question of wizārat to the fore. Asad Khān and Zū'lfīqār Khān had yielded the wizārat to Mun'im Khān very reluctantly. Zū'lfīqār Khān now considered that he had the best claim to the vacant office. At first, Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān who occupied a position of great influence at his father's court was of the same view. He and Sa'dullāh Khān,<sup>93</sup> the Dīwan-i-Tan and Khālīṣah,

<sup>92</sup> M.M. 42 b-44 b, Irvine i 121.

<sup>93</sup> He was the son of 'Ināyatullāh Khān, the Mīr Munshī of Aurangzīb. We are told that in ability and hard-work he had no parallel in his time, and was proposed that Zū'lfiqār Khān should be made the wazīr, while the sons of Mun'im Khān—Mahābat Khān and Khān-i-Zamān<sup>94</sup>—should be appointed Mīr Bakhshī and Viceroy of the Deccan respectively. 'Azīm-ush-Shān thereby wanted to keep on the right side of Zū'lfiqār Khān and, at the same time, to reward the sons of Mun'im Khān who, of late, had become his great friends. But the proposal was opposed by Zū'lfiqār Khān and the Emperor. The former was not prepared to give up the post of the either Chief Bakhshī or that of the Viceroy of the Deccan. He, therefore, claimed the post of wazīr for his father while himself remaining Mīr Bakhshī and the Viceroy of the Deccan. Bahādur Shāh's objection was that the sons of Mun'im Khān were unfit for the posts proposed for them.<sup>95</sup> As for Zū'lfiqār Khān's claims, there was no precedent that three powerful posts such as those of the wazīr, the Chief Bakhshī and the Viceroy of the Deccan should be held by members of one family, and Bahādur Shāh rightly held that it would be dangerous for the dynasty, 'Azīm-ush-Shān was inclined to agree with this view. Hence, Zū'lfiqār Khān's demands were turned down. It was then proposed that the Ṣafwid prince, Muḥammad Hāshim, should be formally appointed the wazīr, and one of the bakhshīs should be asked to carry on his duties. But the prince gave so much offence by his haughty ways that this proposal also fell through. In the end, no wazīr was appointed and, as a temporary measure, Sa'dullāh Khān was made the chief dīwān and asked to carry on work under the "supervision and control of Prince 'Azīm-ush-Shān".<sup>96</sup>
[continued]

It would not be correct to see in this dispute only the overwhelming pride and ambitiousness of Zū'lfiqār Khān. Zū'lfiqār Khān seems to have come to the conclusion that circumstances demanded the concen-considered a second 'Ināyatullāh, nay, even superior to him. (M.M. 68 b, M.U. ii 827).

94 Mahābat K. occupied the rank of 5000|5000 at the time, and held the office of third Bakhshī. Khān-i-Zamān held the rank of 4000|3000. (M.U. ii 677).

95 K.K. 677-8, M.U. ii 98.

96 "Bah niyābat wa iṭṭālā' -i-pādshāhzādah"—K.K. 678, M.U. ii 98, 831, 504, iii 677-82. The English factor at Cossimbazar reported that the Emperor had promoted 'Azīm-ush-Shān to the "sole management of all affairs under him". (Wilson ii 16).

tration of power in the hands of one man. This belief may be traced back, perhaps, to the latter years of Aurangzīb's reign when the Imperial arms suffered a number of reverses, and was apparently strengthened during the reign of Bahādur Shāh when, Imperial policy seemed to lack a sense of direction. Zū'lfīqār Khān seems to have felt that the Mughal empire could be saved from imminent disruption only by a person with a close personal knowledge of Imperial affairs, who was able to win the confidence of the Rājapūts and Marāthās and the Hindus and, at the same time, secure the support of the old nobles.<sup>97</sup> Such a person, Zū'lfīqār Khān flattered himself, could only be he. From these conclusions followed certain others. Chief of these was that the wazīr must be made the hub of all affairs, and should control not only the executive and financial affairs which were his special province, but also the army which was the special charge of the Chief Bakhshī. He must also be vested with authority over some ṣūbahs with large resources, otherwise he would not be able to maintain his position in face of the jealousy and hostility which he would inevitably meet from a section of the nobles.

Thus, Zū'lfīqār Khān's ambition was not necessarily a guilty or traitorous ambition. But Zū'lfīqār Khān's concept of the wizārat implied a radical departure from the traditions which had been established under the Mughal sovereigns in India, and re-created the possibility of a serious struggle between the wazīr and the monarchy, and between the wazīr and the nobles.

Thus, with the death of Mun'im Khān, the party struggle at the court moved into fresh grooves and led to new developments which shall be studied hereafter.

vi General Policy and Administration

From the foregoing account, it should be clear that under Bahādur Shāh, a gradual departure was made from the policies of Aurangzīb.

<sup>97</sup> Belief in the imminent disintegration of the Mughal Empire was so widespread towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign that Aurangzīb himself echoed them in a number of his letters. Thus, he wrote to Bahādur Shāh "..... it is written that after me will come an Emperor, ignorant, narrow-minded, over-powered by injuries—whose words will be all imperfect and whose

[continued]

This departure was fairly marked in the sphere of the relations with the Marāthās and, to a smaller extent, with the Rājputs. But in the case of the Sikhs, for special reasons, the old policy of repression was pursued with renewed vigour.

A cautious and hesitating departure from Aurangzīb's policies is visible in the sphere of religious policy and in the dealings of the Emperor with his Hindus subjects. Thus, the ban on drinking, and on singing and dancing in the royal court continued<sup>98</sup>—though Bahādur Shāh was far from sharing his father's orthodox out-look. He was a Sūfī—like his wazīr, Mun'im Khān—and incurred the displeasure of the orthodox circles by assuming the title of "Saiyid". His attempt to have the word "waṣī" or heir inserted in the Friday khutbah after the name of 'Alī led to widespread rioting, and had to be abandoned.<sup>99</sup> However, it led to a definite breach between the Emperor and the orthodox section.

As far as Bahādur Shāh's dealings with the Hindus are concerned, we do not hear of the destruction of any temples or forced conversions in his reign. But the ban on the use of pālkīs and 'Arabī and 'Irāqī horses, raths and elephants by Hindus was re-affirmed,<sup>100</sup> and they were also directed not to wear pearls in their ears, and to trim their beards.<sup>101</sup> He is also plans will be all immature. He will act towards some men with so much prodigality as almost to drown them, and towards others with so much vigour as to raise the fear of destruction,....." (Aḥkām 12).

98 Akhbārāt 31 Aug. 1709, B.N. 182, 443. According to Manucci (iii 254) Bahādur Shāh indulged in wine drinking himself.

99 K.K. 603, 661, 681; Akhbārāt.

100 B.N. 1 Jamāda II, yr. 1|30 Aug. 1707; Akhbārāt, 23 Ramāṣān yr. 1, 24 Jam. II yr. 3|Nov. 18, 1707, Dec. 18, 1708 (re-affirmation of the order).

The exact meaning and scope of this order is not clear. Grant of pālkīs and of 'Arabī and 'Irāqī horses to Hindu Rajas is recorded more than once (Akhbārāt; entry d. 17 Shawwāl yr. 3|20 Dec. 1709—to Shāhū; 19 Jam. II yr. 4|6 Aug. 1710 to Rana Amar Singh, etc). From an entry d. 28 Jan. 1708, it appears that soldiers were excluded from the scope of this order. Hence, it would appear that the order applied only to junior Hindu nobles, administrative officials and others who tried to ape the great nobles.

101 Akhbārāt 24 Ramāṣān yr. 1|18 Nov. 1707. Thus, the order was passed much before the Sikh uprising.

said to have issued an order that Hindus were not to be employed as news-reporters in the provinces. Jizyah, while not formally abolished, seems to have fallen gradually into disuse.<sup>102</sup> Thus, distrust of the Hindus, engendered by political conflict and other factors had not yet given up, but the orthodox approach was being gradually modified.

However, the advantages that might have been secured by the adoption of a more liberal and conciliatory policy were off-set by a deterioration in the sphere of administration, and especially of finances. Bahādur Shāh possessed neither the inclination nor the aptitude for administrative affairs. According to Khāfī Khān, "... such negligence was shown in the protection of the state and in the government and management of the country, that witty, sarcastic people found the date of his accession in the words Shāh-i-bī-khabr".<sup>103</sup> However, Bahādur Shāh's neglect of administration was partly made good by Mun'im Khān, the wazīr, who was "a very good man of business", and by Hidāyatullāh Khān (Sa'dullāh Khān), the Dīwān-i-Tan and Khālīṣāh who "in ability and capacity for hard work had no equal in his time".<sup>104</sup>

The deterioration in the financial situation was a serious matter. From a very early period in the history of the Mughal empire, the kings had been faced with the problem of finding sufficient land for being assigned as jāgīr to all their officers. The problem had become progressively more acute, till it had reached the proportions of a crisis in the time of Aurangzīb, as has been noticed earlier. The expansion of the Empire under Aurangzīb had not solved the problem. Bahādur Shāh on his accession made it worse by a reckless grant of jāgīrs and promotions and rewards to all and sundry—so much so that according to Bhimsen even clerks secured high manṣabs.<sup>105</sup> This state of affairs alarmed Ikhlāṣ Khān, the Arṣ-i-mukarrar, who was 102 It was levied at the time of the first Rājput War (K.K. 606), but according to Wārid (6), "in the reign of Bahādur Shāh, jizyah had fallen into disuse". According to V.V. (935), towards the close of his reign, Bahādur Shāh had contemplated abolishing the jizyah, but died before he could do so.

103 K.K. 628.

104 M.U. iii 675, ii 827.

105 Dil. 167 a, Harcharandas 17.

noted for his ability and integrity, and for his strictness in revenue matters and in the taking of accounts. He represented to the wazīr that the reckless prodigality of the King was against prudence and the interests of the state, and that leave alone India, the whole world would not suffice to provide jāgīrs to all those whom he favoured. He suggested that the wazīr should institute an enquiry into the suitability of the appointees, and whether the proposed rank or promotion or reward was not more than they deserved. But neither Mun'im Khān nor Ikhlāṣ Khān were prepared to face the unpopularity of conducting such an enquiry themselves. Ultimately, Muḥammad Sāqī Musta'id Khān, the historian, was entrusted with the job. Before an application was forwarded by the 'Arz-i-mukarrar and the wazīr to the Emperor, it had to be checked and certified by Musta'id Khān. But this entailed inordinate delay. The two leading Queens, Mihr Parwar and Amatul Ḥabīb, and some other persons close to the Emperor started the practise of securing his signature on their applications without referring them to Musta'id Khān for enquiry and approval. But little heed was often paid to such (irregular) grants (by the revenue department). The King instructed the mutṣaddīs to do what they thought was proper, without heeding his signature which, in consequence, lost its value.<sup>106</sup>

We do not know to what extent Mun'im Khān, Ikhlāṣ Khān and Musta'id Khān could place a check upon the reckless grants of Bahādur Shāh. But the growing crisis of the jāgīrdārī system could scarcely be checked by these half-hearted measures. The real nature of the crisis is amply illustrated by the following. It had been the practice of previous Emperors that the manṣabdārs were required to pay for the upkeep of the royal animals, (or more correctly, the Royal Transport Corps). These expenses continued to be demanded by the ākhtā bēgīs and the other mutṣaddīs from the wakīls of the manṣabdārs in spite of the fact that during the reign of Aurangzīb, the income of the jāgīrs was very uncertain, and many of them remained deserted and uncultivated. The jāgīrs were also in very short supply—to use Khāfī Khān's phrase, they were like one pomegranate among a hundred sick—and after considerable delay and difficulty, the manṣabdārs could get only a small jāgīr.

106 K.K. 628-30. The passage is rather obscure at places. c/f Irvine i 139 for a slightly different version.

Notwithstanding this, the mutṣaddīs continued to demand the expenses for the upkeep of the animals in full, although the entire income of the jāgīrs was less than ("was not half or a third of") these sums. In these circumstances, the distress of the families of the manṣabdārs can be imagined. The representations of the wakīls of the manṣabdārs were of no avail, and they were subjected to torture, imprisonment and harassment of every kind to make them pay the dues in full. Things reached such a pass that the wakīls of the manṣabdārs began to resign their jobs in protest.<sup>107</sup>

At length, Mun'im Khān instituted a reform. He passed orders that after a manṣabdār had been allotted a jāgīr, (but not till then), the charges for feeding the animals should be deducted from his total emoluments, and the balance paid to him as tankhwāh.<sup>108</sup> In other words, the upkeep of the animals no longer remained a charge upon the salary of the nobles, but became a central responsibility, and the emoluments of the nobles were scaled down accordingly. "In this way, the burden of the expenses of the animals was taken away completely from the shoulders of the manṣabdārs and their wakīls. Actually, the real significance of this order was that the expenses of animals were remitted altogether".<sup>109</sup>

The reform undoubtedly constituted a substantial relief to the manṣabdārs, but it increased proportionately the responsibility of the central government. Keeping in mind the liberality of Bahādur Shāh in the matter of granting jāgīrs, it may be doubted whether he was able to keep in khālīṣah the lands thus released by the nobles, and to realise from them the funds for the upkeep of the royal animals. Thus, the burden on the state exchequer probably grew.

In any case, there can be little doubt about the serious financial situation in the time of Bahādur Shāh. We are told that when Bahādur Shāh ascended the throne, he found 13 crores coined and uncoined gold and silver in the Agra fort. By the end of the reign, all 107 K.K. 602-3. This passage also is very obscure. cf Irvine, Army of the Mughals, p. 22.

108 Literally, "salary", but this salary could be paid in cash (naqaḍī), or by means of a jāgīr (tankhwāh jāgīr).

109 K.K. 602-3.

this had been spent! Khāfī Khān remarks: "The income of the Empire during his (Bahādur Shāh's) reign was insufficient to meet the expenses, and consequently there was great parsimony shown in the government establishments, but specially in the royal household, so much so that money was received every day from the treasury of Prince 'Azīm-ush-Shān to keep things going".<sup>110</sup> The artillery-men in the royal retinue (wālā-shāhīs) complained that their salary was six years in arrears.<sup>111</sup>

Thus, the reign of Bahādur Shāh witnessed a sharp deterioration in the financial situation and a further accentuation of the crisis of the jāgīrdārī system, although Mun'im Khān and a few others sought to check the worst abuses and to prevent a reckless growth in the ranks and numbers of the manṣabdārs and other grantees. In the realm of policy, the association of the state with religious orthodoxy was considerably weakened, a more tolerant attitude was adopted towards the Hindus, and the rigid approach of Aurangzīb to the Rājput and Marāthā problems was gradually modified. But these new approaches were still too tentative and half-hearted to yield any definite results. It appears that by a process of trial and error, Bahādur Shāh was feeling his way towards a more liberal and acceptable policy, and that he might have succeeded in evolving lasting solutions to some of the problems if he had lived longer. As it was, he failed to reap any definite political advantages from his policy of cautious compromise, and bequeathed to his successors a more difficult situation than the one he had inherited.

<sup>110</sup> K.K. 683.

<sup>111</sup> Akhbārāt 26 Oct. 1711.

CHAPTER III

ZU'LFIQĀR KHĀN STRUGGLES FOR WIZĀRAT

i. The Problem of Wizārat.

The death of Mun'im Khān brought to the fore the problem which was to dominate politics at the court practically for the next two decades, and which became the focal point, as it were, of all the other problems of the Mughal empire. This was the problem of choosing a satisfactory wazīr. The wazīr may be called the king-pin of medieval administration, in the Middle East as well as in India. The relationship of the wazīr with the king had always posed a problem, for a too powerful wazīr threatened to out-top and, ultimately, to displace the king himself, while a wazīr who was not powerful enough often proved ineffective.<sup>1</sup> Akbar had attempted to solve the problem by dividing the work of the central government among a number of officials, more or less of the same standing. He entrusted the charge of the revenue department to dīwāns who were appointed primarily for their expert knowledge of financial and administrative affairs, and who did not necessarily occupy a pre-eminent position in the official hierarchy.<sup>2</sup> Thus, Akbar's wazīrs derived their importance from the trust reposed in them by the Emperor, and by their position as heads of the finance department. But gradually the position of the wazīr as the premier noble at the court was re-asserted. During the latter years of Jahāngīr's reign, and more specially during the reign of Shāh Jahān, some of the most eminent nobles of the time were appointed wazīrs.<sup>3</sup> In the time of Aurangzīb, at first Mīr Jumlah was appointed the wazīr as a reward for his services in securing the throne for Aurangzīb. He was succeeded by Jumdat-ul-

1 For a fuller discussion, see Tripathi, "Some Aspects of Muslim Administration", 161-164.

2 Cf. Tripathi loc. cit. 197-209.

3 Thus, the name of Āṣaf Khān in the time of Jahāngīr and of Sa'dullāh K. in the time of Shāh Jahān might be mentioned. Both held the rank of 7000/7000.

Mulk Asad Khān. Both these incumbents held the highest rank obtainable by a noble—that of 7000/7000. Apart from transacting the business of their office, they were also entrusted, at one time or another, with important military commands. Thus, by the time Aurangzīb died, the old pre-Mughal tradition of the wazīr being the premier noble at the court and the leading councillor of the king, apart from being the head of the finance department, had been largely re-established. Apart from this, the wazīr's post carried with it substantial patronage and opportunities for private gain. Little wonder, therefore, that the wazīr's office came to be considered a prize post and became the object of much back-stair intrigue among the nobles.

In spite of this subtle change in the character of the wizārat, the wazīrs posed no threat to the established monarchy in the time of Shāh Jahān and Aurangzīb. The personal capacity of these monarchs, and the immense prestige of the Mughal monarchy sufficed to keep the wazīrs in their proper place. But whether the institution of wizārat would function equally well when a weak, lazy or incompetent king came to the throne was a question which could not be visualised at the time. It seems that the question did agitate the mind of Aurangzīb at times, but he contented himself with the hope that Asad Khān whom he had trained, would somehow tide over the problem.<sup>4</sup> He also toyed with the idea of partition of empire, as has been already noted.

The triumph of Bahādur Shāh in the War of Succession led to the elevation of Mun'im Khān to the wizārat. He was, till then, only a petty manṣabdār, and he owed his appointment entirely to the services rendered by him to Bahādur Shāh in securing the throne. Apart from being appointed the wazīr, Mun'im Khān was also rewarded with the rank of 7000/7000 (dū-aspah, sih-aspah), the (absentee) governorship of Lahore, and numerous gifts in cash and in kind.<sup>5</sup> In a way, the grant of the rank of 7000/7000 to Mun'im Khān is even more significant than his appointment as the wazīr, for it shows that the idea of the wazīr being the pre-eminent noble at the court, and not merely a financial expert was so generally accepted by this time that his sudden elevation from the rank of 1500 to that of 7000 occasioned no surprise to anyone—though hardly a single instance of such rapid promotion is met with till that time.<sup>6</sup> The other privileges granted to Mun'im Khān merely serve to emphasise the same point.

<sup>4</sup> Aḥkām 11.

<sup>5</sup> B.N. 104, K.K. 626, Kāmwar 14.

The possibility of a clash between a wazir who enjoyed a pre-eminent position in the nobility, and the monarch was avoided in the time of Bahādur Shāh by a number of factors. In the first place, Mun'im Khān never forgot that he owed his position entirely to Bahādur Shāh, and never allowed himself to presume upon his position or past services. He used to say, "Sovereignty is the particular gift of God, and that no obligation could be laid on sovereigns, so that if anyone thought himself conducive to their success, it was in them vanity and folly".<sup>7</sup> Secondly, Mun'im Khān was not the leader of any powerful faction in the nobility, so that Bahādur Shāh had no occasion to be jealous or afraid of his power. He was glad to let Mun'im Khān assume the burden of administration, and was sensible enough not to interfere in the conduct of day to day affairs, or allow others to do so. In the third place, Mun'im Khān, while not an out-standing administrator, was at least a moderately competent one. He won the respect of everyone by his dignified bearing, his learning, and his consideration for the old, 'Alamgīrī nobles.<sup>8</sup> But such a happy combination of favourable factors was unlikely to recur, and the difficulty which Bahādur Shāh encountered in finding a suitable successor to Mun'im Khān posed the problem of wizarat sharply. The ultimate solution adopted by Bahādur Shāh—that of dividing up the work of the wazir between several persons—suggested that one solution was to tread the way back to Akbar's practice. But before the traditions of Akbar in this matter could be fully revived, Bahādur Shāh died. This threw the whole question of wizarat into the melting pot again.

<sup>6</sup> The rank of Mun'im Khān was 1500|1000 when Aurangzīb died, but he had been raised to the rank of 5000|5000 before the battle of Jāju (K.K.575).

<sup>7</sup> Irādat 51.

<sup>8</sup> "The wazir (Mun'im Khān) had taken pains to convince his master that the ancient nobility were the pillars of the state, and that the welfare of the empire depended on their persons. Their ancestors had held offices, and acquired respect and influence with the people so that it was proper and politic to employ them". (Irādat 53-54).

ii. Zu'lfikār Khān and the League of the Three Princes.

After the re-buff suffered by him in securing the post of wazīr for his family, Zu'lfikār Khān adopted new tactics for the fulfillment of his ambition. The primary object of his schemes was to check-mate Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh whom he regarded as the principal obstacle in his way to the wizārat. 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh was the most energetic and capable of the sons of Bahādur Shāh. He had attracted the attention of Aurangzīb at an early age, and was one of his favourites. As the Governor of Bengal from 1697 to 1706, he had accumulated a vast fortune by monopolising the internal trade of the province.<sup>9</sup> His role in securing the throne for Bahādur Shāh, and his influence at the court of the latter has been already noted. Soon, he had so far out-stripped his other three brothers—Jahāndār Shāh, Rafī'-ush-Shāh and Jahān Shāh in wealth, power and influence that it was considered they had no chance of success against him in a war of succession. In order to realise his ambition, Zu'lfikār Khān now strove to unite the three brothers in a coalition against 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh, on the basis of an agreement to partition the empire.<sup>10</sup>

Thus, the most powerful prince and the most powerful noble at the court were openly ranged against each other. It was in this sense that the civil war at Lahore which followed the death of Bahādur Shāh was different from all the previous civil wars fought by the Mughal princes in India.

Till the last moment, Zu'lfikār Khān was uncertain of his success, and made approaches to 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh for a settlement. The precise terms desired by Zu'lfikār Khān are not known. At any rate, the approach which he made through the historian, Irādat Khān, immediately after Bahādur Shāh's death, was curtly turned down by Shaikh Qudratullāh<sup>11</sup> on behalf of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh, and Zu'lfikār was asked to submit without delay for "there was no question of any 9 Riyāz 246, K.K. ii 686. This practise had brought him a stinging reproof from Aurangzīb.

10 M.M. 9a, K.K. 685.

11 He is frequently mentioned in the wakīl's reports of the period, and is said to have been so influential that even the sons of Mun'im Khān had to make other place".<sup>12</sup> Approaches through the sons of Mun'im Khān, likewise, bore no fruit.<sup>13</sup>

[continued]

The nature of Zu'lfiqār Khān's ambition may be gauged by the scheme for the partition of the empire which he is said to have drawn up at this time, or a little earlier. According to the scheme, the entire Deccan south of the Narmada was to go to Jahān Shāh; Multan, Thatta and Kashmir to Rafī'-ush-Shān, and the rest to Jahāndār Shāh. A novel feature of the scheme was that Zu'lfiqār Khān was to be the common wazīr for all the three brothers. He was to reside at the court of Jahāndār Shāh in whose name the coins were to be issued and khutbah read throughout the country, and to exercise his functions through deputies at the court of the other brothers.<sup>14</sup>

It is difficult to decide if the revival of the idea of partitioning of the empire by Zu'lfiqār Khān was a confession of bankruptcy in solving the vexed problem of succession, or was in the nature of an experiment to apply the old solution in a new way. The idea of division had failed in the time of Humāyūn, its futility had been further demonstrated in the time of Shāh Jahān and after the death of Aurangzīb. Perhaps, like Aurangzīb, Zu'lfiqār felt that the Empire had become too unwieldy to be governed effectively from one centre, and that a scheme for decentralization was called for. In Zu'lfiqār's scheme, an attempt was made to bring about decentralization while preserving the basic unity of the Empire. Thus, the eldest brother was to be the symbol of unity, and its pivot, the wazīr: the Emperor would reign, and the wazīr rule. If the scheme had been implemented, real power would have shifted into the hands of the wazīr. According to some authorities, the scheme for partition had originally included 'Aẓīm-ushtheir representations through him. He is also said to have been responsible for Zu'lfiqār's exclusion from the wizārat in 1711 (M.M. 29b, V.V. 943-6, 952).

<sup>12</sup> Irādāt 76.

<sup>13</sup> Nūr-ud-Dīn 9a.

<sup>14</sup> Qāsim 42-3, M.U. ii 99, Wārid 195, 217. According to Wārid, it was also agreed that Jahāndār would keep 100,000 horses, Rafī'-ush-Shān 80,000, and Jahān Shāh 60,000.

Nūr-ud-Dīn (14a) says, however, that the various parts were to be ruled independently by each prince who would be called Pādshāh.

Shān, and been formulated with his consent. But in his pride of wealth and soldiers 'Azīm-ush-Shān, it is alleged, turned false to his promise after the death of Bahādur Shāh, so that the other Princes had no option but to resort to war against him, and allotted the share of 'Azīm-ush-Shān to Jahāndār Shāh.<sup>15</sup> It is scarcely likely, however, that 'Azīm-ush-Shān could have consented to a scheme which would place real power in the hands of a wazīr. The scheme for partition must therefore be regarded as essentially a plan by Zū'lfīqār Khān to realise his ambition of exercising supreme power.

We need not follow in detail the subsequent fighting among the Princes. All observers are agreed that it was due largely to the vigour and intrepidity of Zū'lfīqār Khān that the three Princes gained a complete victory over 'Azīm-ush-Shān who made the error of standing on the defensive, in the mistaken belief that since his treasure exceeded those of his brothers, their armies would soon melt away and he would gain a victory without striking a blow. Zū'lfīqār Khān thus got a chance to seize the initiative. He cut off 'Azīm-ush-Shān from Lahore, and secured possession of the treasures as well as the heavy artillery stored in the fort. He then closely invested 'Azīm-ush-Shān in his camp.<sup>16</sup>

Probably, the real reason for 'Azīm-ush-Shān's conduct was the numerical inferiority of his army compared to those of his brothers.<sup>17</sup> 'Azīm-ush-Shān seems also to have hoped for discord among his brothers whose capacities he despised, and for re-inforcements from Chīn Qulīch Khān and others.<sup>18</sup> But he was over-whelmed by the 15 Inshā-i-Mūdho Ram 73, K.K. ii 685. But c/f Kh. Khālī, a contemporary observer, who says that Zū'lfīqār Khān instigated the fight so that the wizūrat might come to him. (T. Shāhanshāhī).

16 M.M. 9a, Qāsim 44.

17 Valentyn iv 294 estimated the contending forces as follows:—

				Horse	Foot
Jahāndār Shāh	..	..	..	20,000	30,000
Rafī'-ush-Shān	..	..	..	8,000	8,000
Jahān Shāh	..	..	..	25,000	30,000
				<hr/> 53,000	<hr/> 68,000
'Azīm-ush-Shān	..	..	..	30,000	30,000

18 See p. 76 below

combined armies of his brothers before help could reach from any quarter, and after his army had been thinned by hunger and desertions.

After the defeat and death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, a contention arose between the three brothers about the division of the spoils. Zū'lfiqār Khān had favoured Jahandar Shāh from the first. Perhaps, as Irādat suggests, the reason was that Jahāndār was "a weak prince, fond of his pleasure, averse from business and consequently best suited to the purpose of a minister ambitious of uncontrolled power".<sup>19</sup> According to another observer, Bahādur Shāh had also made a declaration from his death bed recommending Jahāndār Shāh.<sup>20</sup>

The support of Zū'lfiqār Khān proved the decisive factor in recurring victory for Jahāndār Shāh over his other two brothers. On March 29, 1712, a month after the death of Bahādur Shāh, Jahāndār Shāh formally ascended the throne, and was proclaimed the Emperor.

iii. Zū'lfiqār Khān as Wazīr—His Powers and Position.

After Jahāndār Shāh's accession, Zū'lfiqār Khān became the wazīr almost as a matter of right. He also retained the Viceroyalty of the Deccan which he continued to govern through his deputy, Dā'ūd Khān. Further, he was accorded the unprecedented rank of 10,000/10,000 dū-aspah<sup>21</sup> by the new Emperor, and he enjoyed the status and privileges of a prince.<sup>22</sup> His father, Asad Khān, remained the Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq as before, and received the (absentee) governorship of Gujarāt, and the rank of 12,000/12,000. Jahāndār treated him with great respect, and used to call him uncle (amwī).<sup>23</sup> But Asad Khān refrained from taking 19 Irādat 72. Qāsim 16, 17, Kamwar 116-7, and M.M. 10b all substantially agree with Irādat.

20 Valentyn (J.U.P.H.S. 211), but doubtful since the Dutch had an interest in the victory of Jahāndār.

21 Akhbārāt April 1, 1712. But Harcharan 24, Wārid 218, and B.M. 1690 (quoted by Irvine in J.A.S.B., 1896, 161) place his rank at 12,000; Kāmwar 393, Nūr-ud-Dīn 34b and Yahyā place it at 8,000; Jauhar (A.S.B.Ms.) f. 35b places it at 10,000.

22 Akhbārāt April 3, 7, 1712. He was also given 4 crore dām as in'ām, 10 lakh huns as sih-bandī, and the title of Yār-i-Wafādār.

23 Akhbārāt April 1, 1712, Harcharan 24, Wārid 218, and Yahyā 118b. But B.M. 1690 (as quoted in J.A.S.B. 1896) says that his rank was 16,000. No mention by K.K. or Kāmwar.

[continued]

any interest in public affairs and seldom went to the court. All power remained in the hands of Zu'lfikār Khān, and in all matters relating to war and peace, Jahāndār was guided by his advice.<sup>24</sup> One of Zu'lfikār's protégés, 'Abduṣ-Ṣamad Khān,<sup>25</sup> was made the Ṣadr with the rank of 7,000. Sabhā Chand, the dīwān of Zu'lfikār Khān, was given the title of Raja, and appointed the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah-Sharīfah (Dīwān of the crownlands).<sup>26</sup>

Zu'lfikār Khān seemed, thus, to have realised his ambitions fully. But he soon discovered that he did not wield as much power as he felt he had a right to expect. This was on account of the underhand opposition of a group of royal favourites who poisoned the ears of the Emperor regarding the wazīr and interfered in the affairs of the administration. Chief among these favourites was Kokaltāsh Khān, the foster-brother (koka) of the Emperor. For a long time, Kokaltāsh had been the friend, confidant and guide of Jahāndār Shāh, and held the charge of all the affairs of that prince.<sup>27</sup> Jahāndār Shāh had promised the wizārat to Kokaltāsh if he should become the Emperor. Kokaltāsh now deeply resented his ex-

Whenever Asad Khān went to the court, Jahāndār treated him with great respect and made him sit near the throne (Jauhar 35b).

<sup>24</sup> Siyar 392.

<sup>25</sup> A Tūrānī adventurer, he had served in the Deccan for a long time. In Bahādur Shāh's reign, he came into prominence, and entered into a marriage alliance with the powerful Chīn family. But some time after this, he fell out with 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān who was then all powerful. At the instance of the latter, he was disgraced, all his property was confiscated, and he was ordered to proceed to Mecca. Just then Bahādur Shāh died. Deeming him a fit instrument for use against 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, Zu'lfikār summoned 'Abduṣ-Ṣamad, and the latter did good service as Mīr Ātish against 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān. (Wārid, Irvine i 180-90).

Jauhar (36a) places his rank at 4000|4000 only.

<sup>26</sup> Akḥbārāt April 6, 1712, Valentyn iv 295, Kāmwar. He was a Kayasth and had long been in the service of Zu'lfikār Khān. On Zu'lfikār's elevation to the wizārat, he was also raised from the rank of 900|300 to that of 2,000|1,000. T Mḥdī says that he died in Jamāda I 1137|Jan.-Feb. 1725, aged nearly 70. Hence, at this time, he must have been 58 years old.

<sup>27</sup> Wārid 223-5, Khush-hāl 68, M.U. ii 100. He had been Jahāndār's deputy in Multan, and in the time of Bahādur Shāh, received the manṣab of 2500|2250, and the title of Kokaltāsh Khān (Akḥbārāt January 5, 1709).

clusion from the wizārat, which was inevitable under the circumstances. Not only Kokaltāsh but his entire family—mother, wife and daughter who had close relations with the royal family, bitterly resented his supersession, and constantly intrigued to displace Zu'lfiqār Khān. They played upon Jahāndār's fears, and tried to convince him that, "the Amīr-ul-Umarā entertained designs too ambitious for a subject, to attain which he would dare to shed the blood of Princes; that he had already determined upon a revolution, either to seize the throne for himself, or otherwise, if he found that too dangerous, to bestow it on 'Alī Tabār (only surviving son of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān) or another of the confined princes, more favourable to his will than His Majesty".<sup>28</sup>

Jahāndār allowed himself to be influenced by these suggestions because he disliked the extreme sternness of the masterful wazīr, and believed that Kokaltāsh Khān would be more amenable to his wishes. Hence, Kokaltāsh Khān was raised to the rank of 9,000/9,000,<sup>29</sup> and accorded the office of the Mir Bakhshī; his brother, Aẓam Khān was promoted to the rank of 8,000 and appointed the Governor of Agra; while his brother-in-law, Khwājah Hasan Khān-i-Daurān, was promoted to the rank of 8,000/8,000, and appointed the second Bakhshī.<sup>30</sup> Kokaltāsh Khān was joined by Sa'dullāh Khān who held the post of the Khān-i-Sāmān with the rank of 5,000, and enjoyed great influence and prestige at the court.<sup>31</sup> After the death of Mun'im Khān, Sa'dullāh Khān had been made use of to exclude Zu'lfiqār Khan from the wizārat and was now afraid of the latter's venom.

28 Irādat 97.

29 Akhbārāt April 25, 1712, Jauhar 35 b, M.U. i 817, B.M. 1690 (in J.A.S.B. 1896, loc. cit.). However, Wārid 218 and Harcharan 24 place his rank at 12,000. Yahyā places it at 7,000 only.

Kokaltāsh was also made the governor of Multan and Thatta and the faujdar of Bakkhar. (Akhbārāt 26 Ṣafar April 4).

30 Akhbārāt April 25, Aug. 7 and 25, 1712, Kāmwar 303, Jauhar 35b, M.U. i 817, K.K. 716.

Kh. Khalīl (4) says that Kh. Hasan was made the Governor of Bengal, and his son Nuṣrat Jang the governor of Bihar. Another brother, Zafar Khān, was made the Dāroghah-i-Fil Khānah, with the rank of 3,000/3,000. (Akhbārāt April 4).

31 M.U. ii 506, Akhbārāt March 31, M.M. 66a.

Fortified by the clandestine support of the Emperor, this powerful clique began to interfere openly in the affairs of the administration, and to set the wazīr's authority at naught. Thus, on Kokaltāsh's advice, Sarbuland Khān was appointed the deputy Governor of Gujarāt without the wazīr having been even consulted.<sup>32</sup> By his advice, and in direct opposition to the wishes of the wazīr, Khwājah Ḥasan Khān-i-Daurān, whom Khāfi Khān describes as "one of the lowest men of the time", was appointed the guardian (aṭāliq) of Prince A'zz-ud-Dīn for the latter's campaign to check the advance of Farrukh Siyar from Bihar. The wazīr had been of the opinion that an old and experienced noble should be nominated to the command, whereas Khwājah Ḥasan Khān-i-Daurān, in the words of a contemporary historian, "had never even killed a cat".<sup>33</sup>

Besides the Kokaltāshī faction, there was a second group consisting of the Emperor's favourite Queen, La'l Kunwar, and her relations, friends and associates, who were also opposed to Zū'lfiqār Khān. La'l Kunwar, who is described as a dancing-girl,<sup>34</sup> had been a favourite of Jahāndār since a long time. After his accession to the throne, she was raised to the status of a Queen, and even allowed to display the imperial standard and march with drums beating as if 32 T Muḡ. 188-9, Nūr-ud-Dīn 38b. Valentyn dates the appointment 15 July, which tallies with an entry d. July 12 in the Akhhbārāt. Another entry d. May 29 states, however, that Sarbuland K. was presented to the Emperor by Zū'lfiqār Khān, and that he received the the manṣab of 5,000|5,000 and other gifts.

At Kokaltāsh Khān's instance, Amānat K., the Governor of Gujarāt, was also transferred to Malwa. Out of pique, Zū'lfiqār secretly instigated the Raja of Rāmpurā to resist him. (Ḥadiqat 23, K.K. 695-7).

33 Gūhe dar ghurbah tīr nah zadah—M.M. 13b, Irādāt 86, Kamwar 386, K.K. 696, 716.

34 Or La'l Kumārī. She is described as a singing-girl (mughīnah) by Irādāt (95) and by Qāsim (55). Irvine calls her Jahāndār's "concubine". She was the daughter of Khaṣṣīyat Khān, a katāwant (musician) descended from the famous musician, Tansen (Ḥadiqat 131). Her father was apparantly alive at the time, for he was presented at the court on April 16, along with three of his sons, and received a khila't, flag, nimah-āstīn, embroidered turban, bālāband, jewelled sword and dagger, waist-band, etc. (Akhhbārāt).

she was the Emperor in person. Five hundred gentlemen-troopers (aḥadīs) followed in her train.<sup>35</sup> She was the constant companion of the Emperor and, as such, enjoyed considerable influence over him.

The hostility of La'l Kunwar to Zū'lfīqār Khān may be attributed to a feeling on her part that the wazīr did not pay due deference to the newly acquired dignity of her relations, and refused to countenance their claims for the offices usually reserved for the nobly-born. Thus, a proposal to appoint one of the brothers of La'l Kunwar as the governor of a province was turned down at the instance of Zū'lfīqār Khān who pointed out that it would cause dissatisfaction among the nobility.<sup>36</sup> On another occasion, Khush-ḥāl Khān, a brother of La'l Kunwar, was arrested by the order of the wazīr on the charge of molesting a married lady. His property was confiscated and he was sent to the fortress of Samugarh. La'l Kunwar was powerless to intervene.<sup>37</sup>

Contemporary writers relate a number of stories to illustrate how in his infatuation for La'l Kunwar, Jahāndār Shāh neglected even the ordinary proprieties and decencies of behaviour, and lowered imperial dignity and prestige.<sup>38</sup> La'l Kunwar also became a channel for the transmission of imperial favour and patronage. Thus, we are told that the doors of her friend Zuhrah, a vegetable-seller by profession, were crowded from morning to evening by people in search of 35 Akhbārāt, Siyar 386, Khaṭīl 23, Kāmwar 385, Nūr-ud-Dīn 37a, K.K. 689, Wārid 219.

36 K.K. 689. Khush-ḥāl (72) mentions the name of Nāmdār Khān, and Siyar (385) of Ni'amat Khān, who is called the uncle of La'l Kunwar. Wārid (222) says Khush-ḥāl K. entitled Ni'amat K.

The province in question is variously mentioned as Lahore (Wārid), Agra (Siyar), and Multan (Nūr-ud-Dīn).

Valentyn 299 gives a slightly different account, and dates the event April 25.

According to Nūr-ud-Dīn, both Zū'lfīqār and Kokaltāsh opposed this appointment.

37 Siyar 386, Akhbārāt Nov. 18, Dec. 5, 1713 (slightly different account).

38 Thus, almost all contemporary writers relate the story how Jahāndār and La'l Kunwar went out on a rath and got drunk [Khush-ḥāl 15, Irādat 95-6, K.K. 690, Nūr-ud-Dīn, Valentyn (slightly different)]. Other stories are also related by Khush-ḥāl and Nūr-ud-Dīn (See Irvine i 192-6).

advancement.<sup>39</sup> Many of La'l Kunwar's relations and friends, too, benefited from the rise in her fortunes. Thus, three of her brothers were appointed to the manṣabs of seven and five thousand, and given profitable sinecures and jāgīrs.<sup>40</sup>

It was quite natural for the nobles and officials to feel humiliated at the marriage of the monarch to a commoner, who moreover, belonged to a despised profession, and to resent the elevation of her relations to a status of equality with them. On the other hand, the friends and relations of the favourite queen could ill-conceal their new-found sense of importance, and by their swagger and high-handedness made themselves obnoxious to high and low alike.<sup>41</sup>

But the influence of La'l Kunwar over matters political should not be exaggerated. There is little evidence to warrant the belief that the elevation of La'l Kunwar became the occasion for the rise of a large number of men from the lower classes to the rank of the nobility. Even the relations of La'l Kunwar were not appointed to any important offices at the court, or to any posts carrying important administrative duties. La'l Kunwar's influence was mainly non-political, and any attempts to draw an analogy between her and Nūr Jahān 39 Irādat 95, Kāmwar 385, Wārid 219. She was an old friend and the sworn-sister (dū-gānū) of La'l Kunwar. It does not seem that she was ever the mistress of Jahāndār. She appears to have gained his regard by advancing him a sum of a lakh of rupees during the civil war at Lahore when he was hard-pressed for money. (Akḥbārāt April 4, 1712).

40 Jauhar 35b gives the ranks of her brothers as follows:—

Khaṣus Khān	..	..	7,000 7,000
Nāmdār Khān	..	..	5,000 5,000
Khush-ḥāl K.	..	..	5,000 5,000
Ni'amat Khān	..	..	5,000 5,000

Wārid (219) says manṣabs from 7,000-9,000 were conferred upon them.

Jauhar also stated that through La'l Kunwar, many kalāwants received the ranks of 5,000-7,000.

41 Thus, Kāmwar (385) states.. "the fiddlers and drummers who were the brothers and relations of La'l Kunwar, swaggered through the streets of Delhi, committing every sort of outrage".

Khāfi Khān (689), says, "It was a fine time for minstrels and singers, and all the fine tribe of dancers and actors."

Āshūb (127) speaks in the same strain.

are misleading.<sup>42</sup> Nevertheless, the mere fact of her having become an avenue of imperial patronage and favour could not fail to react adversely on the prestige as well as the income of the wazīr, the perquisites from the appointees and others seeking imperial favour being a substantial and well-recognized source of income. Here was the main cause of the increasing hostility between La'l Kunwar and Zu'lfiqār Khān.

The emergence of these inner rivalries threw the affairs of the empire into confusion. Zu'lfiqār was extremely powerful, and Jahāndār dared not dismiss him or even oppose him openly on any issue.<sup>43</sup> Hence, he resorted to secret intrigues to get rid of the wazīr, thus creating a pernicious atmosphere which affected every branch of the administration.<sup>44</sup>

iv. General Policy and Administration of Zu'lfiqār Khān.

It was against this background, and out of conviction as well as a general desire to strengthen his position at the court that Zu'lfiqār Khān took a number of steps designed to appease Hindu opinion, and to bridge the gulf which had opened up between the Empire and the Rājput̃s and Marāthās.

We have already seen that during the brief reign of A'zam, Shāhū had been released from captivity at the instance of Zu'lfiqār Khān, and the ranks of 7,000/7,000 and the titles of Mirza Raja and Maharaja were conferred on Jai Singh and Ajit Singh respectively. But the policy of conciliation indicated by these steps had made only very gradual headway in the time of Bahādur Shāh.

After becoming Jahāndār's wazīr, Zu'lfiqār Khān resumed his old 42 According to Kāmwar (385), the days of Nūr Jahān were revived for her, and coins were issued in her name. Such coins, even if issued, have not come down to us.

43 Thus, on one occasion, Kokaltāsh and Zu'lfiqār Khān quarrelled when the latter set aside an appointment made by Kokaltāsh, and hot words were exchanged. When Kokaltāsh complained to the Emperor, he replied that it was no use complaining to him as Zu'lfiqār Khān had full authority to do what he liked, and he, the Emperor, could not interfere in anything, or utter even a word in protest. (Akhbārāt 29 Ṣafar | April 7).

44 Irādāt 103-4.

policy. First of all, jizyah was abolished.<sup>45</sup> This tax, which had become a symbol of narrowness of out-look and discrimination to the Hindus, was removed largely with a view to creating confidence among them, and to clear the way for the establishment of friendly relations with the Rājputs and Marāthās.

Next, Jai Singh and Ajit Singh were raised to the rank of 7,000/7,000, and granted the titles of Mirza Raja Sawai and Maharaja respectively.<sup>46</sup> Soon after this, Jai Singh was appointed the ṣūbahdār of Malwa, and Ajit Singh of Gujarāt. Mandsaur was added to the hereditary kingdom of Jai Singh. Likewise, Ajit Singh was given Sorath, Paltan and Idar, but was compelled to restore Nagor to Indra Singh, and Kishangarh and Rupnagar to Raj Singh. In general, the Rajas were satisfied, for as the Rājput wakīl put it, the Emperor "acceded to all our requests".<sup>47</sup>

In the case of the Marāthās, the earlier arrangements for the Deccan were continued, and Dā'ūd Khān's pact was left undisturbed. A new development, however, was the grant of an Imperial manṣab of 3,000/2,000 and the title of Anup Singh to Shivaji II, the son of Raja Ram (the Kolhapur branch). A khil'at and a royal farmān granting the Deshmukhi of Haiderābād were also sent to him.<sup>48</sup> This implied the recognition of the Kolhapur branch as an Imperial feudatory, inferior in status to the Satara branch (as evidenced by the lower manṣab accorded to its ruler) but in no way subordinate to the latter. Zū'fiqār Khān thus moved towards a solution which seemed <sup>45</sup> Akhbārāt April 7, 1712. It is significant that this step was taken only nine days after the victory of Jahāndār Shah, and at the instance of Aurangzīb's wazīr and life-long friend, Asad Khān.

See also the present writer's article "Jizyah in the post-Aurangzīb's Period" in the I.H.C. Proceedings, 1940, 320-27.

<sup>46</sup> J.R. "Misc. papers" Vol. ii 21. Farmān of grant d. 3 Rabī I, 10 April, 1712, Wakīl's letter and report d. 5 Sudī Chait 1769|April 10.

<sup>47</sup> Akhbārāt Nov. 25, Wakīl's report d. Nov. 30. [The entry in the Akhbārāt bears the following marginal comment in pencil by Sir Jadunath Sarkar: "Mere paper appointments if by Jahāndār". M.M. (59a) tells us, however, that Ajit had just started for Gujarāt when news reached him that Farrukh Siyar's rebellion had reached serious proportions, and he put off his departure].

<sup>48</sup> Akhbārāt Sept. 4, 1712.

also to find favour among a section of the Marāthās, and was, at the same time, most in keeping with Imperial interests. Division of territory had been proposed by Shāhū to Tara Bai as early as 1708, but had been rejected by her.<sup>49</sup> Hence, civil war had continued, with resultant unrest in the Deccan, and the depredation of Imperial territory by both claimants.<sup>50</sup> The division of Mahārāshtra had an obvious advantage for the Imperialists: it set an internal check on the ambitions of the Marāthās. Nor could Shahu have any legitimate cause of complaint against such a step for he had failed to crush Tara Bai and was, at the moment, actually hard pressed by her.<sup>51</sup> In 1711, Tara Bai had sent her wakīl, Āyā Mal, to negotiate with the Mughal court. The envoy was instructed to stay at Udaipur and to conduct the negotiations from there.<sup>52</sup> This shows the direction in which the wind was blowing. The division of swaraj territory and of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan between the two branches was the logical corollary to the recognition of both the branches as separate feudatories. The grant of the Deshmukhi of Haiderābād to the Kolhapur branch appears to have been a step in this direction. In this regard, the action of Zu'lfīqār Khān foreshadowed that of another shrewd politician, Nizām-ul-Mulk, who later tried to check the Satara branch by setting the Kolhapur branch against it.

There is no clear indication of the Sikh policy which Zu'lfīqār Khān intended to follow. He appointed Muḥammad Amīn Khān to continue the campaign against Banda, and thus apparently continued the coercive policy of Bahādur Shāh and Mun'im Khān. Ajit Singh, the adopted son and the legally recognised spiritual successor of Guru Govind, was at the Mughal court with his mother, and held a royal manṣab.<sup>53</sup> Perhaps, it was considered necessary to crush the rising of 49 Riyāsat 13. Shāhū had offered the territory south of the river Warnā.

50 See pp. 46-49 above.

51 In 1711-12, the fortunes of Shāhū reached their lowest point, defeats being followed by desertions to the Mughals. Thus in 1710, Rao Rambhā joined Dē'ūd Khān (Akhbārāt Oct. 12) and in 1711, Chandrasen tentatively approached him. (Akhbārāt June 28, 1711).

52 V.V. 944.

53 Harcharan f. 145a. Ajit was presented to Jahāndār Shāh on May 23, 1712 (Akhbārāt).

(the false Guru) Banda before any steps were taken to help or appease Ajit Singh.

With regard to the Jats and Bundelas, no change was made in the position obtaining under Bahādur Shāh. Chhatrasāl remained a loyal feudatory, and was summoned to join Prince A'zz-ud-Dīn in his campaign against Farrukh Siyar.<sup>54</sup> Chūrāman Jat had sided with 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān in the war of succession at Lahore, but he too was pardoned, granted an audience with the Emperor, and restored to the manṣab which Mun'im Khān had secured for him in 1707.<sup>55</sup>

Zu'lfīqār Khān's attempt to grope his way back to more conciliatory policies and thus to give the Empire a new lease of life, and at the same time, to concentrate political and administrative authority in his own hands, was bound to create a reaction among the old nobility belonging to the time of Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh. The strongest group in the old nobility consisted, at this time, of Chīn Qulīch Khān and Muḥammad Amīn Khān. The rivalry between this family group and Zu'lfīqār Khān's family has been noticed. During Bahādur Shāh's reign, the Chīn family remained in the background. Chīn Qulīch Khān was not satisfied, and resigning his manṣab, lived a life of retirement at Delhi. Muhammad Amīn Khān was made the faujdar of Moradabad, and was then commissioned to chase the Sikh Guru. In anticipation of the coming civil war, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān had approached and won over Chīn Qulīch to his side by promises of high office. When Chīn Qulīch heard the news of Bahādur Shāh's death, he recruited an army and set out for Lahore. But he had marched only a stage from Delhi when he received news of the defeat and death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān. Hence, he dismissed his soldiers and returned to Delhi.<sup>56</sup>

When Zu'lfīqār Khān became the wazīr, he wanted to use his power to crush Chīn Qulīch Khān once for all. But at the instance of 54 Akhbārāt Oct. 29, Dec. 8. Chūrāman promised to help Jahāndār against Farrukh Siyar, but as was his habit, looted both sides and created much confusion during the battle. (Qanungo, Jats, 50).

55 Akhbārāt, 26 Jamāda II, Yr. 1|Nov. 24, 1707. He had also served in the campaign against the Sikhs.

56 M.M. 99h.

'Abduṣ-Ṣamad Khān, another Tūrānī nobleman who was related to the Chīn family by marriage and was a protégé of Zū'lfiqār Khān, Asad Khān intervened and forced Zū'lfiqār Khān to give up his intentions. Chīn Qulīch Khān was presented before Jahāndār Shāh when the latter reached Delhi, and the rank of 5,000, and the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa was conferred on him.<sup>57</sup> But the Khān was dissatisfied, and soon resigned his office and manṣab.<sup>58</sup>

Muḥammad Amīn was confirmed in his commission to pursue the Sikh Guru, and thus remained away from the court.

In this way, this powerful faction remained dissatisfied and dispersed. Zū'lfiqār Khān did nothing more to appease Chīn Qulīch, though he did on one occasion support the latter when the soldiers in his retinue clashed with the servants of Zuhrah, the friend of La'l Kunwar, while passing through a narrow street in the town. Zuhrah, it is said, insulted Chīn Qulīch by calling out to him as "the son of that blind man", and the Khān's followers retaliated by severely belabouring the servants of Zuhrah. Zuhrah complained to La'l Kunwar who spoke to the Emperor. But Chīn Qulīch had already approached Zū'lfiqār Khān who sided with him, and so Jahāndār Shāh did not dare to take any action against him.<sup>59</sup>

It was only when the rebellion of Farrukh Siyar, the son of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, gained serious proportions in the east that Chīn Qulīch was felt to be too important to be neglected any longer. Hence, he was given the manṣab of 7,000, and appointed to the army of Prince A'zz-ud-Dīn. But the Khān was not keen to take part in the fight, and prevaricated. He was still at Agra when A'zz-ud-Dīn was defeated by Farrukh Siyar at Khajwah.<sup>60</sup>

Thus, Zū'lfiqār Khān failed to win the support of the most important group in the old nobility. The attitude of Chīn Qulīch and M. Amīn Khān was an important factor in the subsequent defeat of Jahāndār and Zū'lfiqār Khān at the hands of Farrukh Siyar.

The failure to win over the faction of Chīn Qulīch and Muḥammad 57 Akhbārāt June 21, 24, M.M. 100a.

58 Akhbārāt August 6. Shahāmat K. replaced him as the Governor of Malwa.

59 Irādat 83, Siyar 386.

60 M.M. 100 a, K.K. 700, 716.

Amīn Khān might not have been so serious a matter if Zū'lfīqār Khān had been able to rally other sections of the nobility to his side. But he failed to do so due to a number of reasons. According to the contemporary historian, Irādat Khān, the wazīr had become extremely haughty and proud and notoriously false to his word. He says, "He (Zū'lfīqār Khān) studied to ruin the most ancient families, inventing pretences to put them to death, or disgrace them that he might plunder their possessions. Unhappy was the man who was suspected to be rich, as wealth and vexatious accusations always accompanied each other. He established such vexations and abuses as no prior age had beheld, and by which alone he is now remembered. He took enormous emoluments and revenue for himself while he disposed of money to others with a high hand so sparing that even his own creatures felt severe poverty with empty titles for he never allowed jāgīrs to any. The minds of high and low, rich and poor, near and distant, friends or strangers were turned against him and wished his destruction".<sup>61</sup>

These gross and sweeping generalisations are rather difficult to accept fully. As a matter of fact, Irādat Khān is not an impartial observer, for he had always been opposed to Zū'lfīqār Khān, being attached first to Mun'im Khān and then to 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān. Further, after Zū'lfīqār's accession to power, when Irādat Khān approached him for employment, Zū'lfīqār treated him kindly but gave him no office. Irādat Khān comments sourly "There was no temptation left in employment in a state which had in fact no head, for the ministry was a collection of petty tyrants and abusers of power".<sup>62</sup>

The general charge of "oppression" brought against Zū'lfīqār Khān by Irādat Khān and others<sup>63</sup> seems to be largely based on the many executions and imprisonments, attended with confiscation of property, which took place after the accession of Jahāndār.<sup>64</sup> Irādat Khān

<sup>61</sup> Irādat 96-8.

<sup>62</sup> Irādat 100-1.

<sup>63</sup> Thus, Kāmwar 124a, Wārid 225-6, K.K. 733, M.M. 66a, Āshūb 124.

<sup>64</sup> The imprisoned nobles included Mahābat K. and Khān-i-Zamān (sons of Mun'im Khān), Ḥakīm-ul-Mulk (Chief adviser of Jahān Shāh), 'Aqīdat Khān (son of Amīr Khān) Hidāyat Kesh Khān (Wāqa' Nigar-Kul since 1109/1687-8), M. 'Alī Khān (Bakhshī of Jahān Shāh), Islām Khān Mīr

observes "It had as yet been the usage of this illustrations house, that though a nobleman according to his connections with one of them, appeared against another in the field, that the victor did not put him to death or disgrace him. On the contrary, the fidelity and valour displayed by him in the cause of a defeated rival, were sure recommendations to the conqueror's favour. The princes knew that the stability of power and regulation of Empire rested on the support of an experienced nobility and they would frequently observe, "that the enmity was not to the throne; for whenever a Prince became fixed upon it, they were faithful subjects. If we destroy them, through whom can we administer the government?"<sup>65</sup>

But when the adherents of the defeated princes resorted to Zu'lfiqār Khān for employment, most of them were given a flat refusal.<sup>66</sup> This was a clear departure from the earlier policy, but Zu'lfiqār's personal vindictiveness alone was not responsible for this. It should be remembered that the rebellion of Farrukh Siyar, the son of Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, had still not been suppressed. Kokaltāsh's responsibility for some of the executions etc. is also not clear.<sup>67</sup> But the main factor was that real power was now in the hands of the wazīr who could not afford to take the liberal view that monarchs with an assured position and claim on the loyalty of the nobles had been able to assume.

Irādat also charges Zu'lfiqār Khān with stinginess and reluctance in giving jāgīrs to others while he appropriated vast sums for himself. The charge of miserliness in the matter of manṣabs and jāgīrs was an

Ātish, Hamīd-ud-Dīn Khān 'Ālamgīrī, Sarafarāz Khān Bahādur Shāhī, Amīn-ud-Dīn Sambhalī and more than 20 other nobles (K.K. 688, Akhbārāt entry d. 23 Ṣafar [March 4]).

<sup>65</sup> Irādat 19.

<sup>66</sup> Nūr-ud-Dīn (35b) states that two to three thousand old servants were thus rendered unemployed.

<sup>67</sup> The executions of Rustam Dil, Mukhlis Khān, and Prince M. Karīm are ascribed to Kokaltāsh Khān. (Āshūb 125-6). It is said that Rustam Dil had raised his hand against La'l Kunwar. Questioned by Farrukh Siyar later, Zu'lfiqār Khān disclaimed responsibility for these executions. (M.M. 22b, K.K. 732-3).

Irādat (97) suggests that Zu'lfiqār, who apprehended opposition from Kokaltāsh, was attempting to get rid of his opponents in this way.

old one against Zū'lfīqār.<sup>68</sup> It should be borne in mind that economy was an urgent necessity as the revenues of the kingdom were insufficient for its expenditure, and the treasury was empty.<sup>69</sup> In his munificence, Bahādur Shāh had started squandaring khālīshah land and even Mun'im Khān had felt it necessary to take steps against it. But Mun'im Khān had been unwilling to face unpopularity, and had given up when his attempt had led to a wave of protests.<sup>70</sup> Zū'lfīqār attempted to do what Mun'im Khān had shrunk from doing.

Early in Jahāndār's reign, Zū'lfīqār Khān issued orders that no sanads were to be granted to any manṣabdār till his claims had been checked and confirmed. Nor were any increments in rank to be granted till then. He also attempted to compel the *manṣabdār*s to maintain their stipulated quota of troops and to enforce the regulations regarding the muster of the manṣabdār's troops.<sup>71</sup> But economy and the strict enforcement of rules was not to the taste of the nobles. In particular, Kokaltāsh Khān and the Emperor's favourites complained, and attempted to get round these irksome orders by appointing one of their own nominee as the 'arṣ-i-mukarr' (the official in charge of confirming jāgīrs). This led to an acrimonious dispute between Kokaltāsh Khān and the wazīr who refused to brooke any interference in the revenue department. The dispute was referred to Jahāndār Shāh, but he dared not openly to defy the masterful wazīr.<sup>72</sup> But soon, the rules of Zū'lfīqār Khān were thrown to the winds, and manṣabs were granted to the royal favourites with a liberal hand. Thus, Zū'lfīqār's effort to economize only made him unpopular with his own followers.

The charge that Zū'lfīqār Khān was deliberately seeking to destroy the old nobility need not be taken seriously for we have already examined his treatment of Chīn Qulīch Khān and Muḥammad Amīn Khān who 68 See B.N. 416.

69 c/f K.K. (ii. 684): "In the time of Bahādur Shāh, the income of the Empire was not sufficient to meet the expenses, and consequently there was great parsimony shown in the government establishments, but especially in the royal household, so much so that money was received everyday from the treasury of Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān to keep things going."

70. See p. 58 above.

71 Akabārāt 22 Ṣafar, 16 Jamādā I|March 31, June 21.

72 Akhbārāt 2 Rabī' I, 29 Ṣafar|April 9, April 7.

were his old rivals and formed a most powerful faction in the old nobility. Many nobles of the time of Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh continued to hold important posts at the centre as well as in the provinces. The Wazīr resisted the elevation of new, low born men, and on more than one occasion defended the old nobles against the pretensions of the friends and relations of La'l Kunwar. Nevertheless, the charge brought by Irādat Khān reflects the sentiments of a section of the old nobility at their loss of power and influence, and possibly, the diminution of their incomes.

In the sphere of revenue administration Zu'lfīqār Khān found himself faced with an even more difficult task. During the prolonged absence of Aurangzīb in the Deccan, the administration in northern India had become slack. The financial crisis and the crisis of the jāgīrdārī system which was visible in the later years of Aurangzīb's reign, had assumed an acute form in the time of Bahādur Shāh. Apparently, the reforms instituted by Mun'im Khān did not appreciably improve the situation. The result was that in the time of Jahāndār Shāh, the old rules of business were thrown to the winds, and ijārah (revenue-farming) became universal.<sup>73</sup> In other words, the zabtī system of Todar Mal, which had so far formed the basis of the entire revenue administration, was now finally and completely abandoned, and the government resorted to the practise of making a deal with revenue-farmers, government officials, and middlemen of all types, leaving them to collect what they could from the *raiya*t. It is obvious that this led to the oppression of the people. It also led to a growing divergence between the real and the paper income of the jāgīrs, and ultimately resulted in the breakdown of the manṣabdārī system itself.

The question is, what responsibility should Zu'lfīqār Khān bear for these consequences of resorting to revenue-farming? It would be unhistorical to fasten on his shoulders the entire blame for the subsequent breakdown of the administration. He was faced with a desperate financial situation and resorted to the easiest and most obvious expedient. With the consolidation of his power and improvement in the political situation, he might have found time to undertake serious administrative reform. For the time being, he was content to leave the financial affairs in the hands of his ex-dīwān, Sabhā Chand.<sup>74</sup> Sabhā Chand was not incompetent for the job, but he was thoroughly detested due to his harshness in revenue affairs, his habit of taking bribes, and his foul tongue. In the Deccan, Zū'lfīqār Khān's deputy, Dā'ūd Khān, was all powerful; but he, too, "left all power in the hands of Deccani Brahmins, and led a life of ease and pleasure".<sup>75</sup>

<sup>73</sup> Wārid 6. We are told that the wazīr and all the other ministers had become accustomed to take bribes (M.U. iii 720).

During the reign of Jahāndār Shāh, the price of grain in the capital rose very high. Repeated efforts to curb the high prices by the condign punishment of the grain-merchants and the officials of the royal market proved unavailing, and this added to the discontent of the people of the capital with the new régime.<sup>76</sup>

v Defeat and Downfall of Jahāndār Shāh and Zū'lfīqār Khān.

While Zū'lfīqār Khān was trying to consolidate his power, and to win the trust and co-operation of the Hindus in general, and the Rājputs and Marāthās in particular, a serious danger developed in the east. This was the rebellion of Farrukh Siyar, the second son of 'Azīm-ush-Shān. As is described later, Farrukh Siyar had proclaimed himself the King at Patna after receiving the news of his father's death. With the adhesion to his side of Saiyid Ḥusain 'Alī Bārahā, the Governor of Bihar, and his brother, Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān Bārahā, the Governor of Allahabad, he had succeeded in collecting an army, and was marching upon Agra. Many nobles of those parts and some of the adherants of 'Azīm-ush-Shān who had fled from Lahore had also joined him.

Even before Jahāndār Shāh had reached Delhi, a royal army under Prince 'Azz-ud-Dīn had been despatched to Agra to deal with Farrukh Siyar. A large sum of money said to be nine crores of rupees was disbursed to him for the purpose. As the Prince was considered to be young and inexperienced, he was placed under the tutelage of Khwājah Ḥasan Khān-i-Daurān and Luṭfullāh Khān Ṣādiq, the prince's dīwān. Neither of these nobles had any experience of actual warfare, and the appointments were made, as has been noticed above, in opposition to the wishes of the wazīr. As more and more nobles rallied to the cause of Farrukh Siyar, the court became alarmed. 'Azz-ud-Dīn was ordered to march from Agra to Allahabad, and Chīn Qulīch Khān was propitiated with the grant of a manṣab of 7000, and asked to join him. The inexperience and pusillanimity of Luṭfullāh Khān and Khān-i-Daurān, and the discord between the latter and Prince 'Azz-ud-Dīn was a major source of weakness from the outset. The soldiers were dispirited, for the salary of many of them was considerably in arrears. Above all, 'Azz-ud-Dīn himself disliked La'l Kunwār and suspected her of hatching plots against him. The sudden flight of 'Azz-ud-Dīn and Khān-i-Daurān from Khajwah on November 28, 1712, on the eve of battle, can only be ascribed to these internal differences. Their camp, equipage etc. was plundered by the soldiers, and a good part of the material and stores of war fell into the hands of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers. This induced many nobles of those parts who had been sitting on the fence till then to throw in their lot with Farrukh Siyar. Some of the nobles attached to 'Azz-ud-Dīn's army also joined Farrukh Siyar. These included Luṭfullāh Khān Ṣādiq, the Prince's dīwān.<sup>77</sup>

<sup>74</sup> Kāmwar, K.K. 689.

<sup>75</sup> Mir'āt 403, K.K. 964, 748.

<sup>76</sup> Akḥbārāt 22 Ṣafar, 17 Jamāda I, 19 Jamāda II, 13 Ramāzān (levying of abwābs on grain forbidden, and Chowdhris of the grain-market tied up and produced before the court)|March 31, June 22, July 24, October 14: Also see Khush-ḥal 91, 118.

News of the flight of 'Azz-ud-Dīn woke Jahāndār to a real sense of danger for the first time. Urgent efforts were made to collect an army and to march from the capital to meet the enemy. The biggest obstacle was the complete lack of money. All the hoarded treasures had been expended by Bahādur Shāh. What remained had been spent during the civil war at Lahore. Jahāndār Shāh had inherited an empty treasury. But he paid no heed to the situation, and made the worse matters by his senseless extravagance in illuminations and celebrations of which both he and La'l Kunwar were very fond. The result was that since his accession eleven month ago, the army had not been paid a single pie.

In desperation, Jahāndār broke up all the gold and silver vessels which he could find, sold the jewels and jewelled articles, and even took down the gold ceilings in the royal palaces. The store-houses were thrown open, and goods were distributed to the soldiers in place of cash. Even then, the claims of the army could not be met.<sup>78</sup>

77 K.K. 717, Kamwar.

Thus, the last of the reserves accumulated since the time of Babar were exhausted. The financial bankruptcy of the Empire was complete. The task of vandalism had been commenced long before the Jats and Marāthās reached the gates of Delhi, by the Timurid princes themselves.

After great exertions and difficulty, an army was at last collected, and on December 9, Jahāndār set out for Agra. Letters were written to the Rājput Rajas asking for help, but it was practically certain that the issue would be decided before they could arrive.<sup>79</sup> Even then, the army of Jahāndār was superior to that of Farrukh Siyar in both numbers and artillery. Jahāndār had 70-80,000 horse and innumerable foot, whereas Farrukh Siyar had "not one-third of these numbers". But Jahāndār's army was demoralised and divided in counsel. Zū'lfīqār and Kokaltāsh Khān failed to agree even on a plan of battle. At the instance of Kokaltāsh Khān, it was weakly decided to stand on the defensive on the line of the Jamuna, and to seize all the boats in order to prevent Farrukh Siyar's army from crossing over. But the Saiyids found an undefended ford, and after making a forced night march, crossed the river, and turned the position of Jahāndār Shāh. The battle was fought on January 10, 1713 and was bitterly contested. The lack of co-ordination between Zū'lfīqār and Kokaltāsh, the neutrality of Muḥammad Amīn and Chīn Qulīch at a critical moment, and the cowardly flight of Jahāndār from the field of battle before the issue had been finally decided gave Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers a complete victory.<sup>80</sup>

Thus ended the reign of Jahāndār Shah and with it, the wizārat of

<sup>78</sup> Wārid 247-48. Also see Irvine 220-1.

<sup>79</sup> Akhbārāt. Farmāns were actually sent to Jai Singh and Ajit Singh as early as 3 Rabī' I|April 10, summoning them to the court; and on 1 Rabī' II|May 8, they were formally appointed to the army of 'Azz-ud-Dīn, and mace-bearers despatched to escort them to the court. But the Rajas delayed in making an appearance.

<sup>80</sup> M.M. 15a, Wārid 255-259, K.K. 700, 718-24, Ījād 88b-91a. See also Irvine 219-236.

Zu'lfiqār Khān. Though of brief duration, the reign of Jahāndār Shāh marks the emergence of several important tendencies to the surface. In the first place, it demonstrated that in the prevailing conditions the only alternative to an all-powerful King was an all-powerful wazīr. For when the necessary energy and capacity were wanting in the King, the wazīr was the only official with sufficient prestige and authority to lay down policies, run the administration and keep the nobles under control. The difficulties which would arise in such a development were also demonstrated. An all-powerful wazīr was likely to arouse the distrust of the King and the envy of the nobility. In such a situation, the wazīr could maintain his position only by organising a bloc powerful enough to meet any rival or possible combination of rivals, and by enlisting for this purpose the support of independent elements outside the court, viz. Rājputs, Marāthās etc. This, in turn, created the danger of the establishment of a personal domination by the wazīr, which would threaten the dynasty as well as its leading supporters in the old nobility. The logical outcome was a new dynasty and a new nobility directly dependent upon the wazīr, or the overthrow of the wazīr, in which case the same process might start all over again. During Jahāndār's reign, the situation did not develop to its logical conclusion but all the factors for such a development were present.

In the second place, the reign of Jahāndār Shāh marks the rapid abandonment of the policies of Aurangzīb which had, to some extent, been maintained by Bahādur Shāh. Thus, the jizyah was abolished, large concessions were made to the Rājputs, and an attempt was made to maintain and extend the accord with the Marāthās. It would appear that Zu'lfiqār Khān was attempting to revive the liberal traditions of Akbar, and to develop a composite ruling class in the country, and, as a logical corollary of it, to establish a national monarchy broad-based upon religious toleration and the support of the Hindu as well as the Muslim masses. Zu'lfiqār Khān thus underlined the failure of Aurangzīb's attempt to hold the Empire together by emphasising Islam and the Islamic character of the ruling class.

CHAPTER IV

THE SAIYID BROTHERS STRUGGLE FOR "NEW" WIZĀRAT (i)

i Antecedents and Early Careers of the Saiyid Brothers.

The domination of the affairs of the empire by the brothers Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān Bārahā and Saiyid Ḥusain 'Alī Khān Bārahā—often referred to as the "Saiyid brothers", lasted from 1713 to 1721. Outwardly, the history of these years consists of a series of crises caused by a struggle for power between the two brothers who occupied the posts of wazīr and Chief Bakhshī, and the Emperor Farrukh Siyar. The culmination of the struggle is reached with the deposition of Farrukh Siyar in 1718, and an attempt by the two brothers at wielding absolute power.

However, the real interest of the period lies not so much in the struggle for power at the court as in the conflict over policies which again brought to the forefront the question of the character and composition of the ruling class, and of the state itself.

Before entering upon a detailed analysis of the important events, it would not be out of place to examine briefly the antecedents and early careers of the two brothers, Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān and Saiyid Ḥusain 'Alī, who play a conspicuous role in the political developments of the period.

The Saiyids of Bārahā claim descent from one of the distinguished families of Wasait in Mesopotamia. Much before the advent of the Mughals in India, one of their remote ancestors, Abū'l Farāh came to India with his twelve sons, and settled down in the sarkār of Sirhind, between Meerut and Saharanpur. Cut off from the country of their origin, and marrying in the country, they formed numerous settlements and became thoroughly Indianised in their manners and habits in course of time.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Tārīkh-i-Sādāt-Bārahā. See also Irvine i 201-2.

The Saiyids of Bārahā first attracted attention during the reign of Akbar when they won the hereditary right to lead the Mughal van in battle. Their custom was to fight on foot in the Indian fashion.

After the death of Akbar, Saiyid Khān Bārahā played an important part in countering the conspiracy to set Jahāngīr aside in favour of his son, Khusrau. Murtaẓā Khān Bārahā was another important figure. Under the successors of Jahāngīr, the Saiyids of Bārahā continued to occupy an important place in the Mughal army, but none of them seems to have attained a high manṣab, or been appointed to a high office.

Though reckoned as brave fighters and doughty warriors, the Bārahā Saiyids acquired a reputation for unreliability and ambitiousness. On one occasion, we find Aurangzīb writing: "To relax the reigns of authority to the Saiyids of Bārahā is to bring a final ruin i.e. a bad end because these people on getting the least prosperity and promotion boast 'There is none like me', stray from the path of right conduct, cherish high handedness and cause impediment".<sup>2</sup> We do not know how exactly the Saiyids of Bārahā had acquired this reputation.

Hasan 'Alī (afterwards 'Abdullāh Khān Quṭb-ul-Mulk) and Ḥusain 'Alī Khān were the two eldest sons of 'Abdullāh Khān Saiyid Miyān. The latter had arisen in the service of Rūḥullāh Khān, the Chief Bakhshī of Aurangzīb, and after receiving a manṣab had attached himself to Prince Shāh 'Ālam. Subsequently, he was the ṣūbahdār of Bījāpur, and then of Ajmer.<sup>3</sup>

The elder brother, 'Abdullāh Khān, was about thirty-one years of age and was the faujdār of Sulṭān-Nazarpur in Bangalore in 1698. It was in that year that the Marāthās under Nīmājī Sindhia raided the province of Khandesh for the first time. 'Abdullāh Khān put up a disastrous but heroic fight against Nīmājī, and thus won his spurs as a brave warrior.<sup>4</sup> Two years later, in 1700, 'Abdullāh Khān displayed great energy in fighting another Marāthā general, Hanumant. He sacked Hanumant's base camp, made his nephew, Janoji, a prisoner and converted him to

<sup>2</sup> Aḥkām 32, 8.

<sup>3</sup> M.U. ii 489-91, Akhhbārāt Jan. 29, 1700.

<sup>4</sup> K.K. 457.

Islam. Zū'lfīqār Khān who was passing that way commended 'Abdullāh Khān's bravery, and recommended him for a rise from the rank of 800 to 1000, and his younger brother, Ḥusain 'Alī for a promotion from the rank of 700 to 900. But Aurangzīb turned down the recommendation, saying "It is difficult for me to consent to their promotion in one step", and sent them two robes and daggers only as a mark of royal favour.<sup>5</sup>

Soon after this, 'Abdullāh Khān joined the service of Jahāndār Shāh who was the eldest son of Shāh 'Ālam, and was the Governor of Multan. Ḥusain 'Alī was appointed the faujdār of Ranthambhor and later of Hindaun-Bayānā.<sup>6</sup>

In 1702, in a battle against a Billoch zamindar, Jahāndār Shāh assigned the honours of battle to his favourite, 'Īsā Khān Main. This annoyed 'Abdullāh Khān who claimed the honours for himself. In high dudgeon, he quitted Jahāndār's service, and repaired to Lahore. There he remained unemployed till 1707 when Mun'im Khān, who was on his way to Agra for the war against A'zam, secured for him the manṣab of 3000.<sup>7</sup> Ḥusain 'Alī also joined Bahādur Shāh near Delhi, and was granted the manṣab of 2000.<sup>8</sup>

The Saiyids fought well at Jājū, losing one brother, Nūr-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, and Ḥusain 'Alī being wounded. They received a rise of 1000 each, but were not satisfied, and pressed their claims with some vigour, which annoyed Prince Jahān Shāh who was his father's favourite at the time.<sup>9</sup> Hence, they received no employment, but were compelled to follow in the wake of the court, thereby incurring heavy expenses.

In 1708, 'Azīm-ush-Shān appointed Ḥusain 'Alī his deputy in the Governorship of Bihar.<sup>10</sup> 'Abdullāh Khān remained unemployed. At one time during the Rājput War, he was offered the Governorship of Ajmer. But he made a number of far-reaching demands; viz., the forts of Jodhpur and Mirtha and the faujdārī of Ranthambhor must be made 5 Ahkām 32.

6 M.U. i 322, iii 132. Irvine (i-203) is not correct in thinking that both 'Abdullāh and Ḥusain 'Alī joined Jahāndār Shāh.

7 M.U. i 825-6, iii 130, Qāsim 56.

8 M.U. i 322, iii 132, K.K. 456.

9 Akhbārāt, B.N. 309, Wārid 237, Irvine i 204-5.

10 Akhbārāt April 1, 1708.

over to him, he should be exempted for ten years from repayment of the advances made to him for his expenditure and from having the horses of his army branded, his personal followers must be admitted to manṣabs; his jāgīrs in the Deccan should be confirmed, Rājput̃s who applied for service should be given manṣabs in accordance with his recommendations, etc. etc.. His demands were accepted formally, but they were not to the liking of the Emperor and his advisers. Hence, the old ṣūbahdār, Shujā'at Khān, was soon reinstated, and 'Abdullāh Khān remained unemployed.<sup>11</sup>

'Abdullāh Khān was again called upon to serve during the Sikh campaign. At the battle of Anantpur in 1710, he fought on foot as was the custom of the Bārahā Saiyids, and after great slaughter, won a signal victory.<sup>12</sup>

In 1711, when 'Azīm-ush-Shān was looking around for adherants, he appointed 'Abdullāh Khān his deputy in the Governorship of Allahabad.<sup>13</sup>

Thus, the two Saiyid brothers were indebted to 'Azīm-ush-Shān for their appointments. They enjoyed a reputation for bravery, but were considered haughty and ambitious. Their career had in no sense been remarkable, and it is probable that they would have died as obscure nobles had it not been for the circumstances created by the Civil War and the rebellion of Farrukh Siyar.

ii Early Relations of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid Brothers.

Although Abdullāh Khān and Ḥusain 'Alī were clearly under an obligation to 'Azīm-ush-Shān for their employment, they did not proclaim 'Azīm-ush-Shān when news was received of the death of Bahādur Shāh. Farrukh Siyar, the second son of 'Azīm-ush-Shān, had been camping at Patna for some months before this occurrence. The prince had been his father's deputy in the Governorship of Bengal since 1707, and had recently been recalled to the Court. Leaving Rajmahal about June, 1711,<sup>14</sup>

11 Akhbārāt 17 Oct. 1708, M.M. 58a.

12 Akhbārāt May 28, June 4, 1710; Irvine i 105-6.

13 Akhbārāt Jan. 10, 1711.

14 'Izz-ud-Daulah Khān-i-Jahān, the Governor designate, reached Rajmahal on June 1, 1711, and so Farrukh Siyar must have left soon after. (Ri'yāz 240).

he had reached Patna at the commencement of the rainy season,<sup>15</sup> and had not resumed his journey at the time of this occurrence. In reality, he was reluctant to proceed to the Court for he enjoyed little favour with his father as compared to his brothers.<sup>16</sup> According to some others, it had been predicted that he would be king on the death of Bahādur Shāh, and so he delayed purposely.<sup>17</sup>

Farrukh Siyar's prolonged stay at Patna was apparently not to the liking of the Governor, Ḥusain 'Alī Khān, and relations between the two became strained. While in Bihar, Farrukh Siyar led an expedition against one Ri'āyat Khān who had secured control of the fort of Rohtas by producing before the commandant a forged farmān of appointment. As Rohtas was a very powerful fort, Farrukh Siyar had recourse to duplicity. He inveigled Ri'āyat Khān out of the fort on a false assurance of safe conduct and then massacred him along with his entire family.<sup>18</sup> Farrukh Siyar's action lowered him in the public esteem, and created an unfavourable impression on Ḥusain 'Alī.<sup>19</sup>

When on March 15, 1712, news reached Patna of the death of Bahādur Shāh, Farrukh Siyar at once proclaimed his father, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, as king, and struck coins and had khuṭbah read in his name. Ḥusain 'Alī who had gone out against some malcontents in the direction of Rajgir, did not like this.<sup>20</sup> Apparently, he wanted to sit on the fence till the results of the contest at Lahore were known. He came 15 From Patna, he sent an *'arḍāsh*t pleading the approach of the rainy season and the advanced pregnancy of his wife for his inability to march further. (Kāmwar).

16 M.U. i 322-23.

17 According to Nūr-ud-Dīn (40 a) and M.M., sovereignty on the soil of Bihar had been predicted for him by an astrologer.

But according to Riyāz, he had been hailed as King by the famous Ṣūfī saint of Burdwan, Ṣūfī Bāyazīd, as early as 1697 when, as Prince, he had visited him to seek blessings for his father (Riyāz 242-43).

18 K.K. 708-10. The capture of Rohtas was reported to Bahādur Shāh on Feb. 1, 1712, and on the 10th, a robe an elephant, and an arwish were sent to the prince as rewards (Akhbārāt). Irvine (i 205) wrongly states that it was Ḥusain 'Alī who had proceeded against Rohtas.

19 K.K. 710.

20 Nūr-ud-Dīn 40, K.K. 711, M.M. 14b, Jauhar 26b.

back to Patna and, according to one writer, wanted to arrest Farrukh Siyar who had only a small following with him. But he was prevented from doing so by Aḥmad Beg who was Farrukh Siyar's chief lieutenant and who exerted himself to collect an army on his behalf.<sup>21</sup> Farrukh Siyar wrote flattering letters to the Governor who was at last persuaded to give his support to the Prince. This seems to have happened before the result of the contest at Lahore was known.<sup>22</sup>

When news arrived of the defeat and death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, Ḥusain 'Alī wanted to draw back. The Prince himself wanted to commit suicide in despair. But Farrukh Siyar's mother threw herself on the support of Ḥusain 'Alī, appealed to his sense of generosity and his old relations with 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, and fired his imagination by promises of high office. "Whatever the result, you will be the gainer", she is reported to have told him. "If defeated, your name will stand recorded as a hero till the day of judgement; if successful, the whole Hindustan will be at your feet, and above you none but the Emperor".<sup>23</sup>

21 M.M. 14a.

22 K.K. 710-11. Qāsim (80), Irādat, and Kh. Khālī (25) state that the Saiyids joined Farrukh Siyar immediately he reached Patna.

On the other hand, M.M. (14 b) and Wārid (232-5) state that the Saiyids joined after the news of Jahāndār's victory. But Wārid's chronology is unreliable—he makes Farrukh Siyar leave Rajmahal after the news of his father's defeat. Nūr-ud-Dīn (ff. 39b-41a) upon whom Wārid bases himself is not clear, stating that Ḥusain 'Alī "objected about joining Farrukh Siyar till the termination of the affair of his father".

The reports of the English factor at Patna tend to support K.K. (Wilson ii XXIX).

For a further discussion, see the present author's article "Early Relations of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid Brothers" in Medieval India Quart., Vol. ii 1955.

Mr. S. H. Askari, ("Bihar in the First Quarter of the 18th Century", Ind. Hist. Congress Proceedings, Vol. V, 394-405) thinks that Ḥusain 'Alī held a second coronation after he joined Farrukh Siyar, the first coronation being held immediately following the news of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān's death, on April 6, 1712.

I have failed to trace in any contemporary authority reference to a second coronation at Patna.

23 Nūr-ud-Dīn 41a, Wārid 323.

Ultimately, Ḥusain 'Alī agreed to join Farrukh Siyar, partly because he was afraid he was already too deeply committed, and partly due to his dislike of Jahāndār Shāh and his disgust at the absolute authority enjoyed by Zū'lfqār Khān at his court.<sup>24</sup>

But the mutual suspicion and ill-will between Farrukh Siyar and Ḥusain 'Alī did not end with the latter's adherence to his cause. Ḥusain 'Alī, we are told, was afraid of "the notorious low-down cunning and deceitful nature of Farrukh Siyar".<sup>25</sup> The reports of the English factor at Patna give a graphic account of the heights to which the mutual suspicion and ill-will reached. Farrukh Siyar was hard pressed for money and formed a plan of levying contributions on all the rich merchants, including the English and the Dutch, and of plundering the town. But Ḥusain 'Alī deemed it dishonourable and also against good policy. In particular, he took the English and the Dutch under his protection. Hence, "Hosain Aly exerted to preserve the town and had put his forces at the gates (of the town) with orders to oppose any that shall molest or offer to plunder". Najm-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, the younger brother of Ḥusain 'Alī, foiled several attempts by Farrukh Siyar to plunder the city. Farrukh Siyar went so far as to offer Ḥusain 'Alī a fourth share of the booty if he would withdraw his opposition, but to no avail. The result was that two parties came into existence, "one composed of the Nabob and several others, and the other composed of a rascally crew". It was rumoured that Farrukh Siyar was trying to get Ḥusain 'Alī out of the way by sending him to Bengal, "to fetch Moorshid Aly Cawn or treasure or his head", and that "the Nabob freely accepts his new employment that he may get free of the king and it's supposed will never return but will join with Cawn Bahadoor Cawn ('Izz-ud-Daulah Khān-i-Jahān, the Governor of Orissa)". Ultimately Ḥusain 'Alī's appointment was cancelled due to these suspicions, and instead, Muḥammad Razā and Mīrzā J'afar were sent against Murshid Qulī who inflicted a crushing defeat on them.<sup>26</sup>

The ill-will between Farrukh Siyar and Ḥusain 'Alī kept on 24 Wārid 236, Tārīkh-i-Fathīyah, M.U. i 323.

25 M.M. 14a.

26 Wilson ii 50-56, 81, 86; Ījād 51a.

growing till there were differences of opinion between them on practically every point. In addition to this, there were altercations and mispunderstanding among their followers. This delayed preparations for marching on the capital.

At this time, Khwājah 'Āṣim (later entitled Khān-i-Daurān) who had been present in the battle at Lahore and had escaped with great difficulty after 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān's defeat, reached Patna. He rapidly established his influence over Farrukh Siyar, and strove to bridge the differences between him and Ḥusain 'Alī. At length, through his efforts, the mutual suspicions abated sufficiently—at least to outward appearances, for the march towards the capital being commenced on September 18, 1712.<sup>27</sup>

In reality, however, Ḥusain 'Alī was far from being happy, and relations between him and Farrukh Siyar continued to be strained. Thus, the two did not see eye to eye on the treatment of Siddhishta Narayan, the zamindar of Bhojpur in Shāhbād, and one of the most powerful men in those parts. Ḥusain 'Alī had an old standing quarrel with Siddhishta Narayan, but Farrukh Siyar intervened through Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Aḥmad Beg, and persuaded the Raja to join him. A number of Rājput̃s who had been imprisoned by Ḥusain 'Alī were ordered to be released. Ḥusain 'Alī did not approve of these proceedings, but gave way at the instance of Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Aḥmad Beg.<sup>28</sup>

It is difficult to say whether the differences between Farrukh Siyar and Ḥusain 'Alī were essentially personal, or extended to the sphere of policy. While in Bihar, Farrukh, Siyar, at the instance of Saiyid Ḥusain 'Alī, issued a proclamation abolishing the jizyah.<sup>29</sup> This was an important political move on Ḥusain 'Alī's part with far-reaching implications. But there is no evidence that Farrukh Siyar was, at that stage, opposed to the move.

However, Ḥusain 'Alī continued to sulk and took little part in public affairs till the royal camp reached Allahabad early in November, when 'Abdullāh Khān, the elder brother of Ḥusain 'Alī, came and resolved the ill-will between him and Farrukh Siyar.<sup>30</sup> Thus, 'Abdullāh Khān played an important role in cementing the alliance with Farrukh Siyar. Indeed, since the time of his arrival in the camp, he seems to have become the dominant figure in the alliance, outstripping his younger brother in the management and control of all affairs.

<sup>27</sup> Ijād ff. 53a-55b.

<sup>28</sup> Ijād ff. 62b-63b.

<sup>29</sup> Akhbārāt, entry d. 17 Rabī II yr. 2|April 12, 1713. See also the present writer's article "Jizyah in the post-Aurangzeb period" I.H.C. Proceedings, 1946, 320-27.

We have already noticed that in 1711, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān had nominated Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān his deputy in the Governorship of Allahabad. Apparently, 'Abdullah Khān did not fare well in his new charge for he accumulated large arrears of salary to his soldiers. At the time of Bahādur Shāh's death, a convoy of treasure from Bengal, consisting of the tribute of that province and income from the jāgīrs of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, had reached the boundry of the province of Allahabad. 'Abdullāh Khān deemed it a golden opportunity to meet his hard-pressing obligations. He seized the convoy which was said to contain 28 lakhs of rupees, and distributed the money among his followers.<sup>31</sup>

'Abdullāh Khān could scarcely have expected that such a serious offence would be forgiven by Jahāndār Shāh, particularly as his relations with Jahāndār Shāh had been strained since the time he had quitted his (Jahāndār's) service and joined that of his rival, 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān.<sup>32</sup> Hence, 'Abdullāh Khān opened correspondence with Farrukh Siyar, and the latter hastened to send him a farmān confirming him in his post, and sanctioning belatedly the money which he had already seized for his expenses.<sup>33</sup> Meanwhile, 'Abdullāh Khān also petitioned Jahāndār Shāh, mainly, it seems, with a view to gaining time till Farrukh Siyar should approach.

Thus, 'Abdullāh Khān's adherence to Farrukh Siyar's cause was entirely due to personal reasons, and his supersession by Jahāndār Shāh was not so much its cause as its logical result.<sup>34</sup>

On November 5, 1712, Farrukh Siyar reached Jhūsī and received

30 Ijād 74a.

31 K.K. 711, 715.

32 See p. 88 above.

33 Ijād ff. 64; K.K. 711, 715; Qāsim (Sarkar Ms.) 450.

34 Jahāndār Shāh attempted too late to reconcile the Saiyids by the restoration of Allahabad, and the grant of the mansab of 7000|7000 dū-aspah, 2 crore
[continued]

‘Abdullāh Khān in audience. The previous assurances given to the two brothers were reaffirmed—though it is not clear whether they were formally invested with the office of wazīr and Mīr Bakhshī at this time or not.<sup>35</sup>

From the foregoing review of the early relations of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers, it should be apparent that the favourites of the Emperor, Khān-i-Daurān and Mīr Jumlah, were not responsible for the ill-will between the two parties at the outset. In fact, the influence of Khān-i-Daurān was cast on the side of reconciliation at this stage. But later, fresh grounds of discord and hostility arose in which the "favourites" played a definite role.

According to Yahyā, the Mīr Munshī of Farrukh Siyar, after the battle of Agra Farrukh Siyar offered the post of Wakīl-i-Muṭlaq to ‘Abdullāh Khān on the plea that he had promised the wizārat to Aḥmad Beg. This would have made ‘Abdullāh Khān largely a figure-head, leaving real power in the hands of the Emperor's favourites. But ‘Abdullāh Khān was fully alive to the implications of Farrukh Siyar's proposal, and rejected it on the ground that he had won the crown for the Emperor by his own sword and right arm, and that his title to be the wazīr was indisputable. As Farrukh Siyar had just succeeded to the throne, and his position was not yet secure, he thought it wise to give way.<sup>36</sup> But this revealed his lack of confidence in and continued suspicion of the Saiyids.<sup>37</sup>

dām as inām to ‘Abdullāh Khān, and the rank of 7000|7000 to Husain ‘Alī (Akhbārāt 13 Rajab, 10 Ramāḡān|August 16, Oct. 10).

This suggests that the real importance of the Saiyids was far greater than appears from their rank and office, and that this was recognised by Jahāndār Shāh only belatedly.

35 Irvine (i 213) asserts, apparently on the authority of Ījād, that formal engagements were entered into with the Saiyid brothers at this juncture, making over the post of wazīr to ‘Abdullāh Khān, and that of Mīr Bakhshī to Husain ‘Alī.

I have failed to find any support for this statement in Ījād.

36 Yahyā 122a. See also K.K. 727-8, and M.M. 23a.

37 cf. the action of Shāh Jahān who, after his elevation to throne, did not appoint his leading supporter, Aṣaf Khān, to the post of wazīr, but relegated him to the post of Wakīl. Farrukh Siyar may have attempted to ape Shāh Jahān's action.

iii Position and General Policy of the Saiyids after the Accession of Farrukh Siyar.

After the flight of Jahāndār Shāh from the field of battle and the formal proclamation of Farrukh Siyar, 'Abdullāh Khān was made the wazīr and Husain 'Alī the Mīr Bakhshī with the ranks of 7000/7000. They were also granted the governorships of Multan and Bihar respectively, and allowed to govern them through deputies. Saiyid Najm-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān and a number of their younger brothers and other kinsmen were also admitted to manṣabs. The maternal uncle of 'Abdullāh Khān, Saiyid Muẓaffar Khān Bārahā, was made the governor of Ajmer.

But apart from these posts, the Saiyids claimed no special position for themselves or their kinsmen. Indeed, far from seeking to establish a monopoly of power for themselves, they were keen to conciliate and to win over the nobles of the time of Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh. At the outset, the general policy laid down was that all the 'Ālamagīrī nobles were to be confirmed in their (former) ranks, while promotions in zāt rank of 300 and above granted by Bahādur Shāh were held over till they had been subjected to a scrutiny. After some time, exemption from this rule was granted to nobles serving in the Deccan and in the ṣūbah of Kabul, and the ranks enjoyed by them at the time of Bahādur Shāh's death were confirmed.<sup>38</sup> Most of the old nobles were continued in service.

If the Saiyids had their way, even Asad Khān and Zū'lfīqār Khān who were held responsible for the death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh and his son, Prince Muḥammad Karīm, would have been pardoned, and granted high offices. But Farrukh Siyar, acting in defiance of their wishes, desired to make an example of these two nobles. He treacherously imprisoned and executed Zū'lfīqār Khān, and disgraced Asad Khān. There can be little doubt that Farrukh Siyar acted against the best interests of the Empire and the monarchy, for he destroyed two of the most experienced nobles who would also have acted as a counter to the power and authority of the Saiyids.

38 Akhbārāt 30 Muḥ., 4, 10 Ṣafar, 14 Rabī' I yr. 2|Feb. 26, March 2, 6, April 10, 1713.

Farrukh Siyar regretted his action later on.<sup>39</sup> The conclusion Ḥusain 'Alī drew from the execution of Zu'lfīqār Khān was that Farrukh Siyar was "a man who paid no regard to claims of gratitude, and was devoid of faith, a breaker of his word and altogether without shame. In these circumstances, it was incumbent upon them to act according to their own design without regard to the objects of the sovereign".<sup>40</sup>

The only powerful faction that now remained in the nobility was the one consisting of Chīn Qulīch Khān, M. Amīn Khān and 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān. 'Abdullāh Khān realised the importance of this powerful group and wanted to win it over to his side through Chīn Qulīch Khān. At 'Abdullāh Khān's request, Chīn Qulīch was accorded the rank of 7000/7000 and the title of Nizām-ul-Mulk, and appointed the viceroy of the Deccan, with powers to select the lands to be held in jāgīr for furnishing his pay and that of his followers, and to suggest the manṣab to be granted to the chief zamindars there. Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, the former deputy-Viceroy, was transferred to Gujarāt as the deputy-Governor.<sup>41</sup> 'Abdullāh Khān used to say that he regarded Nizām-ul-Mulk as his "elder brother". He called at Nizām-ul-Mulk's residence before the latter left for the Deccan and costly gifts were exchanged between them as a token of friendship.<sup>42</sup>

M. Amīn Khān, the cousin of Nizām-ul-Mulk, whose neutrality at a critical moment had helped the Saiyids to win the battle of Agra, 39 K.K. 732-3, M.M. ff. 22a-b, Irvine 248-53. Zu'lfīqār K. had declined 'Abdullāh Khān's offer of securing him a pardon, and was led into a trap by Taqarrub Khān, a personal follower of the Emperor, who took the most binding oaths for his safety.

40 Wārid 276.

41 K.K. 740, M.M. 23a.

42 Nizām-ul-Mulk was appointed on 4 Ṣafar | March 2, 1713; on 15 Ṣafar further honours were conferred upon him and he was given leave of departure. On 23 Ṣafar, 'Abdullāh Khān and Ḥusain 'Alī visited him and presents were exchanged. On 12 Jamāda I | June 6, he crossed the Narmada which was then in floods, on an elephant (Letter to Jai Singh). He entered Burhanpur on 29 June which fact was reported to the Emperor on 2 Rajab | September 22. (Akhhbārāt).

was appointed the second Bakhshī with the title of I'timād-ud-Daulah. His son, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, was made the Dāroghah of the aḥadīs.

'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān had been the chief lieutenant of Zu'lfīqār Khān. But since he was related to Nizām-ul-Mulk by marriage, he was pardoned, granted the rank of 7000/7000, and appointed the governor of Lahore. The choice was a wise one, for 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān was to prove a very successful governor. He put down the Sikh and Afghan depredations with a firm hand, and restored prosperity to that much harrassed, strategic province.

In most of the other provinces, the old nobles were reinstated in their former offices, while a number of posts which gave constant access to the Emperor went to his personal favourites. The Emperor and the Saiyids did not see eye to eye in all these appointments. We shall examine the nature of their differences a little later.

After making the various appointments, the problem which Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers faced next was of devising a suitable policy towards the Rājput, Marāthās, Sikhs and a number of other allied problems. While in Bihar, Farrukh Siyar, at the instance of Ḥusain 'Alī, had issued a proclamation abolishing the jizyah.<sup>43</sup> This order was confirmed after the victory of Farrukh Siyar at Agra.<sup>44</sup> But it appears that formal effect was not given to it till Ḥusain 'Alī submitted a petition in April, 1713 praying that a parwānah be sent to the Daftar-i-Dīwānī (confirming the order of abolition).<sup>45</sup> Similarly, the

<sup>43</sup> See 93 above.

<sup>44</sup> This was done on Jan. 16, 1713, six days after the victory over Jahāndār. (B.M. 1690, f. 163, Kāmwar 390, Khush-hāl 99. Irvine i 246).

<sup>45</sup> Akḥbārāt April 2, 12, 1713. V.V. (935) gives a story that Bihari Das, the Wakīl of Udaipur, gave friendly advice to 'Abdullāh Khān that "the Hindus were alienated on account of (the imposition of) Jizyah... if he abolished Jizyah, the foundations (bunyād) of his power would be strengthened." 'Abdullāh Khān agreed to this and got the Emperor to excuse jizyah.

Tod (ii 935) states that jizyah was abolished at the instance of Khemsi Bhandārī after Ḥusain 'Alī's Mārwar campaign.

Khush-hāl states that jizyah was abolished at the instance of Chhabelā Ram, and this is supported by Shiv Das, who has reproduced a copy of an 'arṣī submitted by Chhabelā Ram's nephew, Girdhar Bahadur, in 1720 to pilgrim-tax was also abolished from a number of places,<sup>46</sup> though the ban on the Hindus using pālkīs and 'Arabī and 'Irāqī horses continued for some time.<sup>47</sup>

[continued]

As for the Rājput̃s, immediately on Farrukh Siyar's accession, Jai Singh, Ajit Singh, the Mahārānā and others had sent letters of felicitation and submission which were placed before the Emperor by Ḥusain 'Alī.<sup>48</sup> Messengers were sent to Jai Singh and Ajit Singh summoning them to the court.<sup>49</sup> But they feigned fear and apprehension in coming to the court because of the perfidious conduct of the Emperor in the case of Zu'lfīqār Khān. However, they expressed their readiness to accept any service in the provinces to which they might be appointed, and promised to come to the court after two or three years when their fear had abated. At the same time, privately, they petitioned for the ṣubahdārīs of Malwa and Gujarāt, or Malwa and Burhanpur.<sup>50</sup>

The attitude of the Rājput̃ Rajas provoked the ire of Farrukh Siyar. At a meeting which was attended by Ḥusain 'Alī, Mīr Jumlah and Khān-i-Daurān, he remarked "I have no doubt about the loyalty of Jai Singh, but it is now certain that he is in league with Ajit Singh. We must use statecraft and statagem (to deal with them). It is not possible that we send both (the Rajas) to the same quarter, as that would be against the interests of the Empire." In other words, like Bahādur Shāh before him, Farrukh Siyar felt that the union of Jai Singh and Ajit Singh was a Muḥammad Shāh, stating that when Chhabelā Ram had joined Farrukh Siyar, he had secured a promise from him to abolish jizyah if victory was granted to his arms. According to this agreement (qarār-dād) the jizyah was abolished. (Shiv Das, Iqbāl-nāmāh, 329).

46 Bālmukundanāmāh No. 27, Akhbārāt Aug. 14, 1714—complaint that the faujdār of Allahabad was charging four annas per pilgrim attended to; Jan. 12, 1716 ditto for Agra.

47 The order was confirmed on Dec. 11, 1713 and reaffirmed on June 10, 1714. But on Oct. 20, 1715, the wakīls and muṭsaddīs who had used pālkīs in the time of Aurangzīb were allowed to do so, and on Nov. 19, 1716, the order was cancelled altogether at the instance of Mukham Singh, the Wāqī-Nigār Kul. (Akhbārāt).

48 Akhbārāt Jan. 29, 31, Feb. 6, 12, 18 and 20, 1713, Kāmwar 394.

49 Akhbārāt July 14, 16, 1713.

50 M.M. ff. 59b-60a.

threat to the Empire. Hence, in the same meeting, it was decided that after Ramaẓān (c. 20th Oct.), Ḥusain 'Alī would leave for Mārwar with an army to chastise Ajit Singh.<sup>51</sup> At the same time, both Jai Singh and Ajit Singh were raised to the rank of 7000/7000, and Jai Singh was appointed the ṣūbahdār of Malwa, and Ajit Singh the ṣūbahdār of Thatta. This move was designed to disrupt the alliance of the two Rajas. It succeeded in doing so. Jai Singh accepted the offer of Malwa and left for his charge, but Ajit Singh who "had his eyes on Gujarāt, felt it beneath his dignity to accept Thatta, and refused to obey".<sup>52</sup>

This provided a justification for the war against Ajit Singh.<sup>52a</sup> At first, Farrukh Siyar decided to lead the campaign himself, in order to vindicate the Imperial prestige which, it was felt, had been sorely offended by Ajit Singh's disobedience of the Imperial orders. Another reason for Farrukh Siyar's annoyance was that Ajit Singh had assassinated Mukham Singh and Mohan Singh, sons of Inder Singh of Nagor, both of whom were Mughal manṣabdārs.<sup>53</sup> However, in the middle of December, the campaign against Ajit Singh was entrusted 51 J.R.—Pancholi Jagjiwan Ram's Report to Jai Singh d. 7 Ramaẓān Yr. 2|Sept. 27, 1713.

52 M.M. f. 60a, Khalīl 40. The Rajas were appointed on 6 Shawwāl Yr. 2|Oct. 26, 1713 (Akhbārāt, and Jai Singh's letter d. 11 Shawwāl, Kamwar 12 Shawwāl). The Rajas were asked to proceed to their charge immediately without waiting for regular and formal farmāns. (Ḥusain 'Alī's letter to Jai Singh d. 1125, Misc. Papers, Vol. II p. 159). In reply, Jai Singh informed the Emperor that he had sent his peshkhānah towards Ujjain. (Letter d. 11 Shawwāl, Misc. Papers, ii 153).

52a According to Irvine (i 236), the cause of the war with Ajit Singh was that "after forbidding cow-slaughter, forbidding call for prayers from the Alamgiri mosque, besides ejecting Imperial Officers from Jodhpur..... he had occupied Ajmer." But Jodhpur had been evacuated by Bahādur Shāh in 1709, and there is no mention of its subsequent re-occupation by the Mughals. It seems that Irvine confused the events of 1707 or of 1720 with those of 1713.

53 This incident took place on Aug. 25, 1713. The Emperor was enraged and wanted to destroy Jaswantpurā, but was dissuaded by Ḥusain 'Alī who pointed out the futility of the step and told Farrukh Siyar that Ajit's treachery would be seen to. (J.R.—"Sarkar Collection", Vol. XIV, No. 73). Also V.V. 841, Tod ii 175, Ojha, Jodhpur, ii 554-5.

to the chief Bakhshī, Ḥusain 'Alī Khān, who set out at the head of a large army on January 6, 1714.

With the commencement of the Mārwar campaign, the struggle between the Saiyid brothers and Farrukh Siyar enters a new phase. Hitherto, it had not gone beyond personal ill-will and mutual recriminations. Now, at the instigation of his favourites, the Emperor went so far as to intrigue against the life and honour of the two brothers. Apparently, the Saiyids did not see eye to eye with the Rājput policy of Farrukh Siyar. Ḥusain 'Alī had been in secret touch with the Rājput Rajas all along, and had been discussing schemes of a compromise with the Jaipur wakil at the court, Pancholi Jagjiwan Ram.<sup>54</sup> On his part, Farrukh Siyar was apparently keen to separate the two brothers so that he could deal with them one by one. Shortly after the departure of Ḥusain 'Alī for Mārwar, he sent secret letters to Ajit Singh, promising him favours if he would defeat and kill the Mīr Bakhshī.<sup>55</sup>

The result of this back-hand intrigue was somewhat unexpected for Farrukh Siyar. Ḥusain 'Alī came to know of the Emperor's plot against him, either because the Emperor's letters fell into his hands, or, as some contemporary observers have suggested, because Ajit Singh communicated their contents to Ḥusain 'Alī in order to induce him to make peace. Letters from 'Abdullāh Khān also reached the Mīr Bakhshī urgently recalling him to court as he ('Abdullāh) was finding it difficult to maintain his position in the face of opposition from the Emperor's favourites.<sup>56</sup>

In March 1714, a treaty was concluded between Ḥusain 'Alī and Ajit Singh. By its terms, Ajit Singh agreed to give his daughter in marriage to Farrukh Siyar (dolā), to send his son, Abhai Singh, to the court with the Mīr Bakhshī, and to attend in person when ever he 54 J.R., report of Jagjiwan Ram, d. Sept. 27, 1713. One compromise offered by Ḥusain 'Alī was that Jai Singh should be appointed the ṣubahdār of Malwa or Burhanpur, and Ajit Singh of Lahore, Awadh, Allahabad or Banāras (Agra may have been meant).

55 Kāmwar 13 Zīqa'dah Dec. 12, K.K. 738, Shiv Das 10.

56 Ibid.

was summoned. He also agreed to give peshkash and to accept the appointment to Thatta.<sup>57</sup>

According to one writer, the treaty was made at the instance of Jai Singh who persuaded Ajit Singh that this was the best course for him in the circumstances.<sup>58</sup> But the most important part of the treaty was a private pact between Husain 'Alī and Ajit Singh which was kept secret for the time being. According to it, Husain 'Alī promised that as soon as Ajit Singh had marched a couple of stages towards Thatta, and thus publicly demonstrated his obedience of the Imperial orders, he would be appointed to Gujarāt. In compliance with this understanding, Ajit Singh left for Thatta, and as soon as he had marched a few stages, he was appointed the ṣūbahdār of Gujarāt.<sup>59</sup>

Thus, Husain 'Alī followed a policy exactly the reverse of the one he had been sent out to implement. Instead of separating the two Rajas, he gave them Malwa and Gujarāt, thus conceding the last of the demands which Jai Singh and Ajit Singh had been making since the time of Bahādur Shāh. This may be said to mark the beginning of an alliance between the Saiyid brothers and the Rājputs.

Meanwhile, relations between the two brothers and Farrukh Siyar were rapidly reaching the point of a crisis.

iv The First Trial of Strength—its Causes and Consequences.

We have already seen that the relations between the Saiyid brothers and Farrukh Siyar were far from cordial from the very beginning. After the accession of Farrukh Siyar, these relations steadily deteriorated till an open breach was precipitated towards the end of the year 1714.

From the outset, the struggle was essentially one for power. The Saiyids wanted not merely the appearance but the substance of power, while Farrukh Siyar, though lacking in any real ability, had the ambition of exercising personal authority. Concretely, the Saiyids desired 57 M.M. 60a, K.K. 738, M.U. i 321, Qāsim 80. According to Iqbāl (Rampur) 6, Ajit gave to Husain 'Alī 50 lakhs in cash, 50 horses, 10 elephants, and 50 lakhs in jewellery as peshkash. These figures seem somewhat difficult to credit.

58 Khush-hāl (Sarkar Ms.) 378.

59 M.M. 60a (the only authority to mention it). The formal farmān was not issued till Dec. 14, 1714 (Akhbārāt).

that "no business should be transacted or manṣabs given or promotions and appointments made without their advice and consultation".<sup>60</sup> Farrukh Siyar felt that this claim went much beyond the traditional powers and functions of the wazīr and that if acquiesced in, it would inevitably reduce the Emperor to the position of a figure-head.

Thus, the real issue was two divergent concepts of the wizārat. Like Zū'lfiqār Khān earlier, the Saiyid brothers felt that the interests of the Empire were bound up with the concentration of effective power in their own hands, and hence, they wanted to make the wazīr the real hub of affairs, while the King merely reigned. They clearly felt that they had secured the crown for Farrukh Siyar by the strength of their arms, and hence considered their claims for supreme power to be indisputable. Farrukh Siyar, on the other hand, stuck to the concept of the wazīr being merely the chief adviser of the King and the head of the revenue department, but not having any power of independent initiative.

This divergence in outlook manifested itself from the very beginning. After his appointment as the wazīr, 'Abdullāh Khān promised the post of Ṣadr to Saiyid Amjad Khān who had held the same post in Bahādur Shāh's time, and that of the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah to Luṭfullāh Khān Ṣādiq.<sup>61</sup> But on his way from Agra, Farrukh Siyar assigned these offices to his own followers—his tutor, Afzal Khān, being made the Ṣadr, and Raja Chhabelā Ram Nāgar<sup>62</sup> being made the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah and Tan.

60 K.K. 379, M.M. 60 (Ṣarkar Ms.). M.U. (i 328) says that 'Abdullāh Khān wanted that no appointments should be made in his department without consulting him.

61 He was the wakīl of Prince Jahan Shāh in the time of Bahādur Shāh, and had deserted him during the War of Succession at Lahore, making his way into Jahāndār's favour by a big bribe (30 lakhs according to Wārid). He was appointed the dīwān of Prince 'Azz-ud-Dīn when the latter was sent to check Farrukh Siyar, and after the flight of that prince, joined Farrukh Siyar. Later, he is said to have assisted Mīr Jumlah in seducing the officers of Jahāndār Shāh. (K.K., Irvine i 227).

Luṭfullāh K. traced his descent from one of the Imāms. His family had come to India in the time of Balban and settled down at Panipat, and its members occupied honourable positions under the later sovereigns of Delhi (Gulshan-i-Ṣādiq, Punjab Public Lib. Ms., 42).

When Farrukh Siyar arrived at Delhi, 'Abdullāh Khān objected to these appointments. On behalf of the Emperor, it was argued that when a sovereign deputed power to a minister, it was for the minister to recognise the limits of that power and not make appointments to high offices without previous sanction. Upon this 'Abdullāh Khān flew into a rage and declared that if his very first exercise of power was contested, there was no point in his being the wazīr.<sup>63</sup>

After some time, a compromise was arrived at. The wazīrs' nominee, Luṭfullāh Khān, was allowed to retain the post of the Dīwān-i-Tan, but the post of the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah was entrusted to Mu'tamad Khān—an old Bahādur Shāhī noble and the ex-Khān-i-Sāmān and Dīwān of Jahān Shāh. Chhabelā Ram Nāgar was appointed the Governor of Agra. Afzal Khān remained in charge of the Ṣadr's office.<sup>64</sup>

But the substance of the dispute remained unsettled.

The ill-will and mutual discord between the King and his ministers was further accentuated by the activities of some of the personal favourites of the King, who thought that their opportunity lay in fomenting the discord between the two sides.

Two of the leading favourites of the King were Khān-i-Daurān and Mīr Jumlah.

Mīr Jumlah was a native of Tūrān, and had been the Qāzī of Dacca and later of Patna in the time of Aurangzīb. He had gradually won the confidence of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān who was then the governor of Bihar and Bengal, and, allegedly, also acquired great influence over his second son, Farrukh Siyar. Mīr Jumlah was at Lahore with 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān when Bahādur Shāh died. After the defeat and death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, he made his way to Agra where he joined Farrukh Siyar.<sup>65</sup>

62 A Nāgar Brahman from Gujarāt, according to Harcharan (33), his real name was Hirday Ram. He had long been employed in the revenue service of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, along with his brother, Dayā Ram, who was killed fighting on 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān's side at Lahore.

Chhabelā Ram was the faujdar of Korā-Jahānābād at the time, and deserted to Farrukh Siyar when Prince 'Azz-ud-Dīn reached that side. (Aẓīb-ul-Afāq f. 19b, 29b, K.K. 728. See Irvine 214-18 for details.)

63 K.K. 729-30.

64 M.M. 23a, K.K. 721, Akhbārāt Feb. 17, 27, and Mar. 8, 1713.

65 M.U. iii 711, Tārīkh-i-Hindī 522-23.

He earned the gratitude of the latter by inducing two of the important nobles, Chīn Qulīch and M. Amīn Khān, to remain neutral in the battle of Agra.<sup>66</sup> After the victory, he was raised to the rank of 6000 zāt, and also rewarded with the posts of the Dāroghah-i-Khawassān and the Dāroghah-i-Ghusalkhānah (superintendent of the private-retinue and the Privy Audience-chamber), and a few other minor posts.<sup>67</sup>

Khān-i-Daurān (Khwājah 'Āṣim)<sup>68</sup> had also been in the employ of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān. His elder brother, Khwājah Anwar, was a boon companion of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, and his virtual prime minister till his death while fighting against a rebel, Raḥīm Khān, in 1697. His accumulated treasures, which were very considerable, were inherited by Khwājah 'Āṣim who, though much older than Farrukh Siyar, joined that prince in wrestling, archery, polo etc.<sup>69</sup> Khwājah 'Āṣim soon acquired so much influence over the young Prince that complaints reached 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān who recalled Khwājah 'Āṣim to Lahore. After the defeat and death of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān, Khwājah 'Āṣim fled to Bihar and joined Farrukh Siyar. He was made the Dāroghah-i-Dīwān-i-Khāṣ and, for same time, also held the post of Mīr Ātish, though he did not play any prominent part in the battle of Agra. After the victory, he was promoted to the rank of 6000/6000 with the title of Khān-i-Daurān, 66 K.K. 700. According to the Jangnūmah of Shri Dhar Murli (J.A.S.B., 1900), the Saiyids had their own agents at the court of Jahāndār Shah for seducing his officers.

67 M.M. 24a, Kāmwar Jan. 17, 1713, Akhbārāt March 9, May 28, 1713, M.U. iii 711.

68 Khwājah 'Āṣim's grand-father, Khwājah Abū'l Muḥsin came to India from Badakhshān (Tūrān) and settled down in the Punjab. His son, Kh. Muḥammad Qāsim, enrolled as a Wūlā-Shāhī of 'Aẓīm-ush-Shān. Subsequently, the family shifted to Agra.

Khwājah Qāsim had five sons: Kh. 'Āṣim and Kh. Muẓaffar were real brothers, and the other three were Kh. Anwar, Kh. Ja'far and Kh. Bāqar. Kh. Ja'far was a faqīr. He called himself the muḥtaḍid of the age and was suspected of shī'ah tendencies. He acquired a great name in the time of Farrukh Siyar, and even had some hand in the political events of the period. Except Kh. Muẓaffar, none of other brothers rose to a high position. (Āshūb 253, M.U. i 819, Imād 23).

69 Riyāz 235-37.

confirmed in the post of the Dāroghah-i-Dīwān-i-Khāṣ, and also appointed the Bakhshī of the Wālā-Shāhīs (the Emperor's personal troops).<sup>70</sup>

Thus, neither Mīr Jumlah nor Khān-i-Daurān had much experience of administrative or military affairs. But both of them—especially Mīr Jumlah, were extremely ambitious. Mīr Jumlah is described as a man of learning and a friend of the learned, a friendly, generous and upright man from whom many received kindness. But “(he) was unwilling that the reins of the government of Hindustan should pass into the hands of the Bārahā Saiyids. When he saw that the sovereign power was entirely under the control of the two brothers, he could not suppress his envy and rivalry”.<sup>71</sup> Mīr Jumlah and Khān-i-daurān resented their supersession by the Saiyid brothers whom they regarded as comparative new-comers and upstarts. Hence, they tried to induce the Emperor by all means in their power to oust their rivals. Farrukh Siyar, who was already suspicious of the Saiyids and dreaded their power and influence, lent a ready ear to these persuasions. He also hoped to find in Mīr Jumlah a more willing tool for his ambition of exercising personal power.

Thus, Farrukh Siyar, Khān-i-Daurān and Mīr Jumlah ranged themselves in opposition to the Saiyid brothers, and upheld the principle of the personal rule of the monarch. As opposed to this, the Saiyids were firmly of the opinion that the task of running the administration should be left in the hands of the wazīr and the Mīr Bakhshī. This became the central issue in party politics during Farrukh Siyar's reign, all other issues being linked with it.

Mīr Jumlah and Khān-i-Daurān gradually gained a complete ascendancy over the mind of Farrukh Siyar who had always been led by others, and had no independent opinion or judgement of his own.<sup>72</sup> The accession of Farrukh Siyar was followed by a spate of executions and confiscations, chief among the victims being Zu'lfīqār

<sup>70</sup> Khazānah-i-Āmrah 246, Sawānīh-i-Khushqū (O.P.L. Ms.) ff. 140a-b, Imād 35, M.U. i 819, Akhbārāt Feb. 16, 1713 (for further increments see entries d. March 9, May 28, June 6, July 8, Nov. 19, 1719), Kāmwār 396, 398, K.K. 729-30.

<sup>71</sup> K.K. 732, T. Hindī ff. 523.

<sup>72</sup> K.K. 730.

Khān and Asad Khān, Sādullāh Khān the Dīwān-i-Tan, Hidāyat Khān the Wāqī' Nigār-i-Kul, Sīdī Qāsim the Kotwāl, and many others. All these were popularly ascribed to the influence of Mīr Jumlah who, it was said, wanted to destroy the old nobility in order to clear his own way to power.<sup>73</sup> It may be doubted if the Saiyids had any hand in them for they preferred, as we have seen, a very different policy. The most heinous crime committed by Farrukh Siyar, allegedly at the instance of Mīr Jumlah, was the blinding of all his younger brothers so as to deprive the Saiyids of a possible tool in case they should wish to displace him.<sup>74</sup>

These events led to a widening of the breach between the King and his ministers. Other disputes also arose. Thus, on reaching Delhi, the Saiyids had occupied the residences lately belonging to Zu'lfīqār Khān and Kokaltāsh Khān. It was suggested to the Emperor that the wealth of generations which was hoarded there had been appropriated by the Saiyids, whereas he, the Emperor, had inherited only an empty treasury.

A foolish superstition that after Bahādur Shāh his youngest descendant would reign, who in turn would be followed by a Saiyid also influenced the impressionable mind of the Emperor.<sup>75</sup>

In spite of these differences and the growing ill-will, there was no open breach between Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyids till, emboldened by the secret support of the Emperor, the favourites started interfering in the administration.<sup>76</sup> Farrukh Siyar authorised Mīr Jumlah to sign all 73 Mīr Jumlah's part in the assassination of Zu'lfīqār Khān has been already discussed. (See pp. 96-97 above). The execution of Sa'dullāh Khān is also ascribed to Mīr Jumlah "who was envious of his reputation as a second 'Ināyatullāh Khān.'" (M.M. 68b). The execution of Shaikh Quḍratullāh, the favourite of Prince 'Aẓīm-ush-Shāh, is inscribed by M.M. (27b-29b) to Mīr Jumlah's fear that the Shaikh would regain his old influence. See also K.K. 740, Wārid 150b, Kāmwar 144, M.M. 30 ff., Irvine 275-81.

74 Wārid 277, K.K. 740, Kāmwar 219a.

75 Wārid 277.

76 Thus, at Mīr Jumlah's instance, Ḥaidar Qulī was made the dīwān of the Deccan with very wide powers. He was made the dīwān of all the ṣūbahs of the Deccan in addition to being the dīwān for the whole of the Deccan. The amānat of all the Khālīṣah lands, and the superintendentship of all the papers on his behalf, and repeatedly declared: "The word and signature of Mīr Jumlah are my word and signature".<sup>77</sup> Mīr Jumlah resorted to the practise of entertaining proposals directly from the aspirants to manṣabs and promotions, and set the Emperor's signature upon letters of appointment without having them passed through the Dīwān-i-wizārat. This was contrary to all the established rules of procedure, and also effected the prestige and authority of the wazīr and deprived him of the perquisites of appointment which were a well-known and substantial source of income. Hence, Mīr Jumlah's practise caused great umbrage to the Saiyids.<sup>78</sup>

Mīr Jumlah was encouraged in his conduct by 'Abdullāh Khān's disinclination to attend to the details of administration. He was primarily a soldier, and preferred to leave all the affairs of state and ministerial duties in the hands of his dīwān, Ratan Chand.<sup>79</sup> Ratan Chand was haughty and over-bearing and, according to one writer, "had a maw as insatiable as the nethermost hell for swallowing gold and silver".<sup>80</sup> He would do nothing without a suitable bribe for himself and for 'Abdullāh Khān, which was in addition to the customary (but illegal) fees for appointments. Mīr Jumlah refrained from these extortionate practises, and also showed despatch in business. Hence, he was preferred by candidates for office and manṣab. Out of pique, Ratan Chand influenced 'Abdullāh Khān, who made it a practice to set aside any appointment in which he suspected the hand of Mīr diamond mines was also granted to him. "In fact, except the wūqār-nawīs and the department of justice, he was entrusted with authority over all other departments." (K.K. 740, M.U. iii 476). Nizām-ul-Mulk did not get on with Haidar Qulī, and after some time, on his own responsibility he ordered him to go back to Delhi. Nizām-ul-Mulk thus gained supreme control of the executive and revenue affairs of the Deccan.

<sup>77</sup> K.K. 739.

<sup>78</sup> K.K. 739, Khush-ḥāl 102.

<sup>79</sup> K.K. 739, Khush-ḥāl 102, Siyar 396, Khālīl 55, Qāsim 78.

Elliot (vii 447) calls Ratan Chand a grain-merchant. There is no evidence to warrant the belief that Ratan Chand ever kept a shop, though he was a bania by caste, and a resident of Jānsath. He had long been an associate of the Saiyids: in 1712 he had fought bravely against 'Abdu'l Ghafūr on 'Abdullāh Khān's side, and as a reward had received the title of Raja and the rank of 2000. (K.K. 692, 712).

<sup>80</sup> Qāsim 87.

Jumlah. Thus, the efficiency of the administration suffered, and much annoyance was felt by the Emperor and the parties concerned.<sup>81</sup>

On another score, too, Farrukh Siyar had justifiable cause for complaint against the Saiyid brothers. Under Ratan Chand, the practice of revenue-farming (ijārah) became universal. Even khālīṣah lands were farmed out. Whenever an āmīl was appointed, Ratan Chand would take from him a contract or lease in writing and realise the money from his banker.<sup>82</sup> Farrukh Siyar rightly considered this practise to be a ruinous one, and had issued standing orders forbidding ijārah.<sup>83</sup>

Mīr Jumlah took advantage of all these factors, and impressed upon Farrukh Siyar that the Saiyids were unfit for high office and that there would be no peace and prosperity in the empire as long as they had a hand in the administration. He charged them, further, with being haughty and ease-loving, and of looking upon the Emperor as their creation, and of lowering his prestige by disregarding his authority.<sup>84</sup>

Hoping to overawe the Saiyids and make them retire from their offices voluntarily, Farrukh Siyar began to augment the military power of his favourites. Mīr Jumlah was permitted to keep 5,000 Mughal sawārs who were to be paid directly from the state treasury and were allotted jāgīrs in the ṣūbah of Lahore. Earlier, Mīr Jumlah had been made the ṣūbahdār of Bengal and raised to the rank of 7000/7000.<sup>85</sup> Khān-i-Daurān, too, was placed at the head of 5000 Wālā-Shāhīs and allotted jāgīrs in the ṣūbahs of Delhi and Agra. He had earlier been appointed the ṣūbahdār of Agra and raised to the rank of 7000. A number of the relatives of these two favourites were also pushed forward till each of them had over 10,000 men at his command.<sup>86</sup>

81 K.K. 739.

82 K.K. 773, 919, Mirāt ii 141, Khush-hāl 399b, Yahyā 123b, Siyar 407. Jāgīr lands were sometimes farmed out even in the reign of Aurangzib (cf. S. A. Rashid, A Calendar of Oriental Records, Allhd. 1956, ii 13). The practise seems to have become universal in the time of Jahāndār Shāh (Wārid 6), and was apparently continued by Ratan Chand.

83 Akhbārāt d. 23 Rajab Yr. 4 | July 25, 1715.

84 M.M. 31a, K.K. 739, Qāsim 78-9.

85 M.M. 31a, Kāmwar 399, Akhbārāt May 28, 1713, Iqbāl 2.

86 M.M. 31a, Iqbāl 2, Kāmwar, Akhbārāt 24, 25 Ramazūn | Oct. 14, 15, 1714.

This was the situation which Ḥusain 'Alī confronted on his return from Marwar.

After due deliberations, Ḥusain 'Alī came to the conclusion that it would not be possible for them to maintain their position at the court unless they gained control of one of the more important ṣūbahs, and could utilise its resources. Accordingly, he demanded and secured for himself the Viceroyalty of the Deccan in place of Nizām-ul-Mulk.<sup>87</sup> His intention was to revive Zu'lfikār Khān's practice of discharging his duties in the Deccan through a deputy, and to remain at the court himself. Hence, he nominated Dā'ūd Khān Pannī as his deputy, stipulating with him for an annual sum of money in return for full freedom to carry on the local administration.<sup>88</sup> This was a vicious practice, but Farrukh Siyar could not logically object to it because shortly before this, his favourite, Mīr Jumlah had been permitted to make a similar pact with Murshid Qulī Khān, the deputy governor of Bengal.<sup>89</sup> However, on the advice of Mīr Jumlah, Farrukh Siyar turned down Ḥusain 'Alī's request, and ordered that he should proceed to the Deccan personally.<sup>90</sup>

A crisis now developed. Like Bahādur Shāh before, Farrukh Siyar regarded the combination of three such powerful posts as those of wazīr, chief Bakhshī and the Viceroy of the Deccan in one family as a threat to the dynasty. On the other hand, the Saiyids were not prepared to relinquish any of the offices they held. Rather, they regarded Farrukh Siyar's order a clever move on the part of their enemies to separate them in order to deal with them one by one. Hence, the "Amīrul-Umarā Ḥusain 'Alī, after considering the course pursued by the King and Mīr Jumlah, refused to go to the Deccan and leave his brother alone at the court".<sup>91</sup>

Apparently, the Emperor also objected to Ḥusain 'Alī's private agreement with Ajit Singh, and delayed issuing a farmān confirming the appointment of the latter as the governor of Gujarāt.<sup>92</sup>

<sup>87</sup> Akhbārāt 11 Ramāzān Yr. 3|Sep. 20, 1714, Kāmwar 20 Ramāzān|Sept. 29.

<sup>88</sup> K.K. 739.

<sup>89</sup> Akhbārāt 3 Jamāda I Yr. 2|May 28, 1713.

<sup>90</sup> K.K. 739, M.U. i 326, iii 712, Khalīl 56.

<sup>91</sup> K.K. 739.

<sup>92</sup> The agreement had been made in April, and in June Ajit Singh had left
[continued]

It was at this juncture that Ḥusain 'Alī discovered a plot to murder him.<sup>93</sup> The brothers thereupon retired to their houses, and fearing an attack by the Emperor's supporters, "meditated the levying of soldiers and throwing up lines of defence round their residence".<sup>94</sup> Thus, the Saiyids clearly showed that they were determined not to yield to threats of force.

Pressed to contemplate an open trial of strength, the Emperor and his advisers hesitated and faltered. Mīr Jumlah and Khān-i-Daurān shrank from measuring their strength with that of the Saiyids of Bārahā, for they "were only carpet knights, not true fighters".<sup>95</sup> Realising their weakness, they advised Farrukh Siyar to open negotiations with M. Amīn Khān, the second Bakhshī, who was an experienced warrior, having won his spurs under Aurangzīb.

We are told that M. Amīn Khān was willing to undertake the task, but in reward he wanted the wizārat for himself. For the Emperor and his favourites, this was a remedy worse than the disease: for if the Saiyids were got rid of with the help of M. Amīn Khān, it would be still more difficult to get rid of him afterwards.<sup>96</sup>

Thus, the dilemma confronting Farrukh Siyar and his advisers was that lacking any real strength and confidence in themselves, they could only juggle with powerful pieces in an attempt to keep real authority in for Thatta. But he was not appointed to Gujarāt till 23 Zilḥijjah Yr. 3|Dec. 30, 1714, i.e. till the dispute with the Saiyids was over. Even then, Ajit was not trusted, and Ḥaidar Qulī Khān, the dwān was granted special powers so that he could act as a check upon him. (Mirāt ii 5-6, Akhbārāt: J.R.—copy of farmān of appointment).

93 According to M.M. (31b), the plot was to make Ḥusain 'Alī a prisoner when he came to present to the Emperor a son who had been born to him recently (Akhbārāt mention the birth of a son on May 15, 1714, and also on Nov. 17). But the plot was revealed to the Saiyids by some palace servants (according to M.M.), or by Luṭfullāh Khān Ṣādiq (according to Aḥwāl), or by the Queen-mother herself (according to K.K. 740).

94 K.K. 740. Kh. Khalīl (57) a supporter of the Saiyids, states that for some days artillery was placed round the imperial fort, and by 'Abdullāh Khān round his house, and there were preparations for war.

95 M.M. 33b, Qāsim 79.

96 M.M. 32 b.

their hands. A ruler more competent than Farrukh Siyar might have succeeded in this game for some time, but it could not but lead to disaster and ruin for the Empire in the long run since it meant the negation of strong and effective rule by the centre.

Failing to coerce the Saiyids, Farrukh Siyar fell back on compromise. Emissaries were sent to the brothers, the Queen-mother herself visiting them and taking the most solemn oaths on her son's behalf. At last, it was agreed that both Mīr Jumlah and Ḥusain 'Alī should assume personal charge of their provinces.<sup>97</sup> It was further stipulated that Ḥusain 'Alī would come to pay his respects to the Emperor only after the departure of Mīr Jumlah whom the Saiyids considered the evil genius of the Emperor. At the time of his visit, all the arrangements in the fort were to be in the hands of the employees of the Saiyids.<sup>98</sup>

According to this agreement, Mīr Jumlah left the court on the 16th December. On the 20th, Ḥusain 'Alī entered the palace, with his men posted at all strategic points. The most solemn vows were exchanged and, outwardly, cordial relations between Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyids were restored. On May 20, 1715,<sup>99</sup> Ḥusain 'Alī left for the Deccan, carrying with him the authority to appoint and dismiss all jāgīrdārs and office holders in the Deccan, and to transfer the commandants of the forts. It was even rumoured that Farrukh Siyar had been compelled to hand over the royal seal to Ḥusain 'Alī so that the latter may not have to depend on his formal assent for appointments etc.

97 Khāfi Khān (741) says that Jumlah was appointed to Bihar only. M.M. (35a) says, however, that Mīr Jumlah was appointed to both Bengal and Bihar. The Akhbārāt refer to him as the ṣūbahdār Bengal (Dec. 15, 25, 1715 and Jan. 18, 1716). The English factors reported that Jumlah was coming as the governor of Bengal, and sent their agents to contact him (Wilson ii 212, 220, 242). However, Mīr Jumlah did not proceed beyond Patna.

98 K.K. 741, Wārīd 284, Khalīl 60. Qāsim (87) ascribes the sending away of both these nobles to the advice of "elderly people" who stressed the dangers of disunity, and the need of appointing a brave noble like Ḥusain 'Alī to the Deccan. M.M. who totally fails to understand the whole point of the dispute, ascribes Ḥusain 'Alī's departure to this disgust with recent affairs.

99 Akhbārāt. Mīr Jumlah's actual departure was not reported till April, 1715. Ḥusain 'Alī stayed on near Delhi for a month after this. On May 28, he reached Rewari which is 50 miles from Delhi.

Further, it is said that before leaving Delhi, Ḥusain 'Alī warned Farrukh Siyar that if his brother was molested or Mīr Jumlah recalled, he could count on his return from the Deccan in twenty days.<sup>100</sup>

Thus ended the first trial of strength between the Saiyid brothers and Farrukh Siyar. The outcome was, to all outward appearances, a great triumph for the Saiyids. The Emperor not only failed to dislodge them from their offices, but had to accept the humiliating condition of handing over the charge of the fort to their men before they would come to pay their respects to him. Thus, the ministers dictated and imposed their own conditions on the monarch who tacitly accepted the special position of the Saiyids.

In fact, however, the struggle revealed the weakness of their position to the Saiyids, and forced them to accept a compromise. They found pitted against themselves not only the monarchy but also a strong section of the nobility, including the powerful group led by M. Amīn Khān. The Bārahā clan, by itself, was too small to maintain them in power, and in the hour of trial, when it was rumoured that the Emperor had decided to dismiss them, many even among the Bārahās had begun to waver.<sup>101</sup> Hence, they felt the necessity of creating a strong territorial base for themselves. But it was impossible to create such a base unless one of the brothers took charge of it personally. It was, perhaps, for this reason that Ḥusain 'Alī dropped his original demand for permission to govern the Deccan through a deputy, and agreed to proceed to it himself.<sup>102</sup>

Thus, on the main point at issue, the Saiyids had to yield. They also agreed to hand over the charge of the Mīr Bakhshī's office to one of the

<sup>100</sup> K.K. 742.

<sup>101</sup> M.M. ff. 33 b, 34 a.

<sup>102</sup> Some of the relations of the Saiyids were of the opinion that the control of two strong territorial units would be preferable to the precarious Wizārat and Mīr Bakhshīgiri. Saiyid Khān-i-Jahān and Asadullāh Khān, the uncles of the Saiyids, are said to have advised them to ask for Bengal and the Deccan. The Saiyids thought the idea to be a good one but felt that they would be accused of mediating independence. (Aḥwāl 93b in Irvine i 300).

It would seem that an additional reason was that the Saiyids had not yet lost hope of gaining full control over the central government.

Emperor's favourites, Khān-i-Daurān.<sup>103</sup> This was partially offset by the departure of Mīr Jumlah for Bihar at the same time. However, Mīr Jumlah was not sent away in disgrace, for he was accompanied by 7000 Mughal troops, these being over and above his quota as a Governor. The Saiyids, doubtless, hoped for some respite from intrigues after Mīr Jumlah's departure, but he remained a constant source of danger to them. Nor did the agreement produce even a temporary abatement in the Emperor's hostility towards them. As a matter of fact, as soon as Ḥusain 'Alī's back was turned, Farrukh Siyar sent secret instructions to Dā'ūd Khān Pannī<sup>104</sup> transferring him from Gujarāt to Burhanpur, and ordering him to resist Ḥusain 'Alī. Dā'ūd Khān proceeded from Gujarāt by forced marches, and reached Burhanpur on August 13. A battle was fought on September 6, in which Dā'ūd Khān was defeated and killed. The secret letters sent to him by Farrukh Siyar fell into the hands of Ḥusain 'Alī, thus giving the Saiyids fresh proof of the duplicity of their royal master.

In addition to the continued hostility of the Emperor and his friends, the Saiyids had to reckon with the powerful group of M. Amīn Khān, Nizām-ul-Mulk and 'Abduṣ-Ṣamad Khān. M. Amīn's part in the conspiracy against the Saiyids has been already noted. Nizām-ul-Mulk showed his resentment at his supersession in the Deccan by 103 Khān-i-Daurān was appointed on June 8, 1715 (Kāmwar). At the time of the dispute, Khān-i-Daurān had secretly promised through his brother, Kh. Ja'far the holy man, not to join any conspiracy against the Saiyids in future (M.M. 34 b, M.U. i 819-30). He may have been acceptable to the Saiyids for this reason.

104 Dā'ūd Khān Pannī had been appointed the Governor of Burhanpur on 27 Rabī' II yr. 3|May 12, 1715, at the instance of Ḥusain 'Alī (M.U. i 326-7, Kāmwar, Akhbārāt. Irvine i 390 is not correct in giving 29 Jamāda I as the date of his appointment.)

According to Shiv Das (Rampur Ms. 16), Dā'ūd Khān had reached Burhanpur to greet Ḥusain 'Alī when he received a farmān appointing him to the Deccan, and a special shuqqa from the Emperor urging him as a faithful servant to resist Ḥusain 'Alī. Dā'ūd Khān had only a small following but he decided to comply with the order, and died fighting.

K.K. 751 tells us that Ḥusain 'Alī learnt of Dā'ūd Khān's hostile intentions only when he reached Akbarpur ferry on the Narmada.

neglecting to call on Ḥusain 'Alī though he passed within a few miles of the latter on his way back to Delhi. Ḥusain 'Alī was surprised and aggrieved, for he had looked upon Nizām-ul-Mulk as a sworn friend. But the latter's resentment at his supersession was not unexpected.<sup>105</sup> If Nizām-ul-Mulk and M. Amīn now joined hand with the Emperor, the position of 'Abdullāh Khān would become untenable.<sup>106</sup>

Thus, the trial of strength settled no basic issues and left 'Abdullāh Khān alone to face a treacherous master and a hostile court, till such time as the Saiyids could gather sufficient strength to finally settle the issues in the manner they desired.

<sup>105</sup> Nizām-ul-Mulk reached Delhi on 11 Rajab 1127|July 13, 1715 (Akhbārāt, Kāmwar 402). The date 11 Jamāda II|June 13, 1715 given by Irvine (i 327) and Y. Khan (Āṣaf Jāh 77-8) is not correct. Y. Khan also states that Nizām left Aurangabad in May which is not correct. K.K. (ii 750) gives early Ṣafar (early February) as the date of his departure from Aurangabad, and we learn from the Akhbārāt that in February, the Nizām defeated Ganga near Burhanpur. (Akhbārāt, entries d. 10, 11 Rabī II|April 15-16).

Thus, Nizām-ul-Mulk reached Delhi two months after the appointment of Dā'ūd Khān to the Deccan, and he could not have had any hand in it. (cf. Irvine i 328).

<sup>106</sup> Qāsim (79, 86) makes out that the Tūrānīs had all along been eager to remove the Saiyids from the Court but wanted to employ strategem (ḥikmat-i-'amlī) rather than courage and bravery.

CHAPTER V

THE SAIYID BROTHERS STRUGGLE FOR "NEW" WIZĀRAT (ii)

For the next few years following the departure of Ḥusain 'Alī from the court, both Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers busied themselves in recruiting allies wherever they could be found. Farrukh Siyar turned to the old nobles, specially to the group consisting of M. Amīn Khan, Nizām-ul-Mulk, and their associates. He also tried to enlist Jai Singh and Ajit Singh on his side. 'Abdullāh Khān and Ḥusain 'Alī sought to counteract these moves. They attempted to retain the support of the old nobles and the Rajput Rajas, while extending their connexions with other elements, including the Jats and the Marāthās.

As a result of this factional struggle the administration was neglected, and the condition of the state went from bad to worse. 'Abdullāh Khān placed more reliance than ever on his dīwān and chief lieutenant, Ratan Chand. The influence of Ratan Chand was felt in all departments—even in the appointment of Qāẓīs. In the revenue department, specially, he acquired so much authority that no one dared to oppose him, and the Dīwān-i-Tan and the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah became "mere cyphers." Ratan Chand leased the revenues to the highest bidders. Even khālīṣah lands were leased out. In this way, while he made a handsome profit for his master, the revenue of the state from both khālīṣah (crown-lands) and the jāgīr (assigned) lands declined.<sup>1</sup> Whenever 'Abdullāh Khān appointed an 'āmil, he took from him a contract or lease in writing, and realised the money from his bankers in advance. This practise was frowned upon by Farrukh Siyar who wanted that the entire income and expenditure must be accounted for. But 'Abdullāh Khān paid no heed to his objections.<sup>2</sup>

The condition of the jāgīrdārs also deteriorated further. Due to the growing divergence between the real and the paper income of the

1 K.K. 773, Kāmwar 405.

2 K.K. 773, Yahyā 123b, Irvine i 335-6.

jāgīrs, they found it more difficult than ever to make the two ends meet. The smaller manṣabdārs were apparently hit the harder. To mitigate their hardship to some extent, Luṭfullāh Khān, the Dīwān-i-Tan, started the practice of granting cash stipends in place of jāgīrs to officers whose ranks were between 50 and 1000. However, it seems that the stipends fixed were too low, and were, perhaps, paid very irregularly.<sup>3</sup> In consequence, many nobles—even the bigger ones—did not maintain any sawārs, and sent false reports in collusion with the mutṣaddīs. Thus, there was a general deterioration in the administration.<sup>4</sup>

An indirect result of these developments was to encourage the growth of a numerous class of bankers, contractors and revenue-agents. Many nobles belonging to ancient families felt over-shadowed by this new class. Their sentiments find an echo in Khāfī Khān's complaint that "Under Ratan Chand, excepting Bārahās and banias no one found any favour", and that "the nobility of every province carried on their existence in disgrace and distrust".<sup>5</sup> Another contemporary observer, Khush-hāl Khān remarks that "Ratan Chand replaced the principles of Kingship by the principles of shop-keeping, i.e., he put everything to sale".<sup>6</sup>

While the administration was thus rapidly heading towards a break-down, political rivalries dominated the court. Whenever the Emperor planned a hunt or went on an outing, rumour went round that an attack on 'Abdullāh Khān was intended. The effective force at the disposal of 'Abdullāh Khān at this time is estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000 men.<sup>7</sup> This was not enough to safeguard his position in a hostile court. Hence, he enrolled more men every 3 Khush-hāl 339b (B.M.).

4 Akhbārāt April 17, 1713. Early in the reign, sawār rank had been abolished for those holding manṣabs below 500. (Akhbārāt 25 Ṣafar Yr. 1|March 23, 1713).

5 K.K. 902, 775.

6 Khush-hāl 102. However, the author praises the financial skill and business acumen of Ratan Chand.

7 Wilson II 95-6. K.K. 795 says he had 20,000 men but they were continuously increasing. M.M. 96 b places the figures at only 7-8,000.

M.M. 96 b places the figures at only 7-8,000.

time the Emperor went on a hunt or there was rumour of a plot against him.<sup>8</sup>

The Saiyids were conscious of the weakness of their position, and endeavoured to gather in their hands the necessary resources to settle the question of power finally. Events so shaped themselves as to give them the opportunity they desired.

In January 1716, Mīr Jumlah entered Delhi surreptitiously in a state of great financial distress. At the time of his departure for Bihar, he had been accompanied by 7000 Mughal troops which were in addition to the contingent permitted to the governor of that province. For the upkeep of these additional troops, he had been granted nine lakhs of rupees in cash and in the shape of assignments on the Bengal treasury.<sup>9</sup> But Mīr Jumlah had failed to deal satisfactorily with the zamindars of Bihar who were notoriously turbulent. At the same time, he had woefully mismanaged his finances so that he was unable to pay his Mughal soldiers. The latter, in turn, committed every sort of excesses and oppression upon the people in order to extort money from them.<sup>10</sup>

Reports reached the Emperor about these oppressions, and also that Mīr Jumlah was committing breach of the royal privileges by witnessing fights of lions, etc. He had also misappropriated 30 lakhs of rupees from the tribute which was annually remitted from Bengal to Delhi.<sup>11</sup>

In consequence, Mīr Jumlah was removed from the Governorship of Bihar in November, 1715, and was replaced by Sarbuland Khan. Soon afterwards, he was also deprived of the absentee Governorship of Bengal.<sup>12</sup>

<sup>8</sup> K.K. 770, Qāsim 90. cf. the remark of Owen (Fall of the Moghul Empire, 141) that the Saiyids had "real reason to fear, rather than to initiate resort to violence"

<sup>9</sup> M.M. 31a.

<sup>10</sup> M.M. 48a-51a (graphic details), Qāsim 89, K.K. 769. But according to Shiv Das (8-10), Mīr Jumlah had dismissed all his Mughal troops on reaching Patna and employed Hindustani troops. The oppressions were committed by the disbanded Mughal soldiers.

<sup>11</sup> M.M. 46a. Shiv Das (9) gives the figure of Rs. 1,80,00,000 and 200 elephants which seems preposterous.

<sup>12</sup> Akhbarāt Nov. 5, 1715, M.M. 46 b.

Ruin stared Mīr Jumlah in the face. His last hope was to appeal to his old patron, the Emperor. Hence, he fled secretly to Delhi. But he was followed there by 7-8,000 of his disbanded soldiers clamouring for their salaries which had not been paid for the last 12 to 13 months. They besieged the house of Mīr Jumlah and created great disorder in the streets of the capital. 'Abdullāh Khān was afraid that these disorders might be used as a pretext for an attack on his house. He engaged more men and "the officers of Saiyid Qutb-ul-Mulk ('Abdullāh Khān) with suitable forces, ready accoutred, mounted on elephants and horses held themselves ready for a conflict". Bārahās flocked into the city hearing that the wazīr whom they considered not only their countryman but their kinsman, was in danger from his enemies.<sup>13</sup>

The Emperor was greatly annoyed by this unwanted trouble and tension which put him in a difficult situation. In anger, he forbade Mīr Jumlah the audience, and deprived him of all his titles and of his manṣab and jāgīr.<sup>14</sup>

Thus, the affair took a turn quite different from what Mīr Jumlah had expected. In despair, he applied to his old enemy, 'Abdullāh Khān. At the latter's instance he was appointed the Qāzī of Lahore, and ordered to leave without an audience. Seven or eight months later, his manṣab and titles were also restored at the instance of 'Abdullāh Khān.<sup>15</sup>

The result of these developments was that a dangerous rival was removed from the path of 'Abdullāh Khān who now felt more secure, while the position of Farrukh Siyar was correspondingly weakened.

K.K. 770 is not correct in stating that Mīr Jumlah was dismissed from Bihar after he came to the court.

13 K.K. 771, Siyar 405-406.

14 M.M. 46b. But K.K. 769 says "When Mīr Jumlah waited upon the Emperor, he was coldly received and he was severely censured for the wretched state of the people of Patna and for having come to the court without permission."

15 On March 3, he was escorted to Narela by Nizām-ul-Mulk, and from there went to Sarhind where he stayed for 7-8 months at a way-side inn, hoping to rouse the Emperor's commiseration. At length, on June 11, 1716, his titles were restored at the instance of 'Abdullāh Khān (Kāmwar, Irvine i 332).

Another event which was destined to have far reaching consequences was the arrival at the court in July 1715 of an English embassy under John Surman. The English had well established factories at Surat, Patna, Murshidabad etc., and were steadily increasing their share in the export trade of Surat as well as the Eastern provinces. They applied for permission to carry on their trade in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa free of duty. The English were convinced that "at Delhi everything was for sale", and that the Emperor's favourite, Khān-i-Daurān, the acting Chief Bakhshī, was all powerful. "The Vizier's Chief Muttsuddys viz. Duan Colsa and Duan Tanki (the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah and the Dīwān-i-Tan) are entirely under his (Khān-i-Daurān's) command so that the poor vizier has but the title with very little authority" they wrote back.<sup>16</sup> Hence, they neglected the wazīr and sent their petition to the Emperor through Khān-i-Daurān.

It was only after the expenditure of much time and money and the failure of two petitions presented through Khān-i-Daurān that the English realised that they had followed a totally wrong procedure, and that Khān-i-Daurān had little power to interfere in the revenue administration. Once the English applied through the correct channels, i.e. through the wazīr, things moved with a rapidity which surprised them. What was even more surprising to them, the wazīr put his seal on the grant "without accepting a farthing".<sup>17</sup>

This grant, which forms a landmark in the growth of the East India Co.'s importance in India's trade, has been popularly ascribed to the successful treatment of Farrukh Siyar by one Dr. Hamilton. But it would be wrong to exaggerate the rôle of Dr. Hamilton, for it was the wazīr, 'Abdullāh Khān, rather than Farrukh Siyar who was responsible for the grant of the English petition. The revenue department had expressed the view that a grant of this nature had no precedent, and was against the best interests of the empire. But these objections were over-ruled by the wazīr.<sup>18</sup> His motives in doing so can only be guessed at. Perhaps, he was impressed by the English threat that unless their petition was granted they would withdraw from

<sup>16</sup> Wilson, English Factory Records, ii XXIV-XXVII, 48-173.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid.

Surat and ruin the trade of that port.<sup>19</sup> Or, he might have hoped that the grant would further encourage the export trade, and thus yield indirect benefits to the empire.

At any rate, the events demonstrated the personal dominance of the wazīr in revenue matters.

ii The Recall of Jai Singh, and the outbreak of the Jat War.

Ever since the departure of Ḥusain 'Alī from the court, Farrukh Siyar had been casting about for a suitable tool to get rid of the Saiyids. His attention was drawn towards Raja Jai Singh who, as the Governor of Malwa, had recently won a big victory against the Marāthā invaders, driving them across the river Narmada with heavy losses. The news-reporters hailed it as the biggest victory gained by the Imperial arms since the days of Aurangzīb.<sup>20</sup> Although Jai Singh owed his initial appointment as the Governor of Malwa to Ḥusain 'Alī, as has been noticed above, Farrukh Siyar set about trying to detach him from the Saiyids. His attempts to do so were facilitated by a number of factors. Jai Singh had felt greatly annoyed at the intervention of Ḥusain 'Alī in the Kotah-Bundi dispute against his protégé and brother-in-law, Budh Singh. Budh Singh had sided with Bahādur Shāh in the battle of Jājū, and as a reward, he had been granted 54 forts which included the fort of Kotah. Bhim Singh, the son of Rām Singh Hārā, had been displaced from Kotah since he had sided with A'zam Shāh. But Bhim Singh had refused to evacuate Kotah, and when Farrukh Siyar ascended the throne, he arrived at Delhi and ingratiated himself with Ḥusain 'Alī. Budh Singh not only avoided coming to the court despite repeated summons, but adopted a hostile attitude during Ḥusain 'Alī's campaign against Ajit Singh, and attacked Kotah. Bhim Singh hurried back to Kotah, and after repulsing Budh Singh's attack, also ousted him from Bundi. At Ḥusain 19 Wilson xlviii. Similarly, while negotiating with Prince Buland Akhtar in 1709 for the right to trade free of duty in Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, the English had threatened to retaliate at Hugli if their petition was not accepted. (Wilson i 297).

20 Akhbārāt June 6, 17; Wāqī'ah Papers, May 28, 29; Letters, May 25. Also see Sardesai Comm. Vol., 68-9.

'Alī's instance, he secured Bundi also in formal grant from the Emperor. In high dudgeon, Budh Singh repaired to Jai Singh at Ujjain, and made the latter promise to intercede with the Emperor on his behalf.<sup>21</sup> Relations between Jai Singh and the Saiyid brothers became cool from this time. Jai Singh showed his hostility by refusing to wait on Husain 'Alī when the latter passed through Malwa on his way to the Deccan, after the quarrel with Farrukh Siyar. Instead, he left Ujjain on the pretext of dealing with a rebel zamindar.<sup>22</sup> According to the etiquette of the times, this was a gross breach of manners on his part, and Husain 'Alī wrote an angry letter to Farrukh Siyar, accusing him of having instigated Jai Singh's action.<sup>23</sup>

Another reason for Jai Singh's dissatisfaction with the Saiyids was their tacit support to the Jats. Jai Singh resented the rise of a Jat power under Chūrāman Jat on the borders of his hereditary dominions. Apart from the irritation caused to him by the constant plundering activities of the Jats, relations between the house of Amber and the Jats had been strained since the time of Aurangzīb when Jai Singh's father, Ram Singh, had fought a series of exhausting wars with Rājārām Jat. After the death of Rājārām, the headship of the Jats had passed to Chūrāman Jat, the son of Bhajjā. For some time, Chūrāman carried on the usual plundering activities. But after the battle of Jājū in 1707, he presented himself before Bahādur Shāh through Mun'im Khān and obtained the rank of 1500/500, and was placed in charge of the road between Delhi and Agra.<sup>24</sup> Subsequently, he took part in the Sikh campaign of Bahādur Shāh, and was present at the siege of Sadhaura and Lohgarh. At the battle of Lahore, he was a partisan of 'Azīm-ush-Shān, but his only part in the battle was to plunder. However, he was pardoned by Jahāndār Shāh and presented 21 Akhbārāt Sept., Oct., Dec. 1713. Bhim Singh reached the court on Sept. 8, 1713 and, at Husain 'Alī's instance, was raised from 2,500 zāt to 3,500 zāt, and granted the title of Maharao. After the capture of Bundi (Akhbārāt, Feb.-March 1714), he was raised to 5000/4000 (2000 dū-aspaḥ). Budh Singh reached Ujjain on Nov. 22, 1714.

22 Akhbārāt July 21, 30; Wāqī'ah Papers, July, 21, 22, 24, 1715. The rebel zamindar's head-quarter was Garh Banera near Bhilsa, 80 kos from Ujjain.

23 M.U. iii 326.

24 M.M. 65 a, B.N. 164.

with a robe and asked to accompany the army against Farrukh Siyar. But when the tide of battle turned against Jahāndār Shāh, Chūrāman was the first to plunder—his Jats invading the women's quarters and causing great confusion and alarm.

Early in his reign, Farrukh Siyar had appointed Chhabelā Ram Nāgar as the Governor of Agra with orders to chastise the unruly Jat leader. Chhabelā Ram employed extra troops and further stiffened his forces with guns brought from the Agra fort. But he failed to bring the Jat leader to book, for the local zamindars rendered him no help. It was also suspected that Chūrāman received secret encouragement from the Saiyids.<sup>25</sup>

After a short time, Khān-i-Daurān replaced Chhabelā Ram as the Governor of Agra. Khān-i-Daurān preferred the methods of peace to those of war. At his instance, Chūrāman was presented at the court and placed in charge of the royal highway from Delhi to the banks of the river Chambal. But gradually, Chūrāman fell out of favour. He had used his position to lay hold of many parganas, and he interfered with the jāgirdārs. Complaints were also received that he was (illegally) levying road-dues (rāhdārī), and secretly manufacturing arms and ammunition. He had also usurped royal territories and erected a mud fort at Thūn which he had made his head-quarters.<sup>26</sup>

In September 1715, Farrukh Siyar sent a farmān to Jai Singh directing him to appear at the court with Rao Raja Budh Singh, Raja Chhatrasāl Bundela, Rao Durga Das, etc. Farrukh Siyar promised to restore Bundi to Budh Singh, and also to appoint Jai Singh at the head of a large army to chastise the Jats. Hopes of other high favours were also held out to him.<sup>27</sup>

Thus, Farrukh Siyar hoped to kill two birds with one stone, viz. to crush the Jats who had made a nuisance of themselves, and also to win over Jai Singh to his side. However, despite his keenness to proceed against the Jats, Jai Singh was reluctant to embroil himself in the factional politics at the court. He, therefore, ignored the summons

25 M.M. 65b.

26 M.M. 65b, Akhbārāt April 25, 27, July 1, 9, 30, 1715; March 20, Aug. 31, 1716 et passim; Letters d. April 25, 1715.

27 Akhbārāt, farmān d. 19 Ramazān Yr. 4|Sept 18. 1715; M.M. 65 b.

of the Emperor, and in October, 1715, left Ujjain for Amber. It was not till June, 1716, that in response to repeated and the most pressing summons from Farrukh Siyar, Jai Singh finally appeared at the court.<sup>28</sup> On his arrival, orders were passed that Bhim Singh should be expelled from Bundi which should be placed under khāliṣah (for safe-keeping), and then handed over to Budh Singh.<sup>29</sup> Soon after this, Jai Singh was nominated to the command of an expedition against the Jats. 'Abdullāh Khān was not even consulted on the subject.<sup>30</sup>

In November 1716, Jai Singh invested the Jat strong-hold of Thūn with 50,000 men. But due to the thick jungles, the broken terrain, the hostile attitude of the local populace, shortage of provisions, and difficulties of transport the siege proceeded slowly. The rains of 1717 were very late in coming. The price of grain rose abnormally high, and Jai Singh had to bring the grain from his own country at enormous cost. The Jats were joined not only by the Mewatis but by many Afghans who came from Shahjahanpur and Bareilly and were employed by Chūrāman at three rupees per day. Even the local zamindars would not help the Imperialists. The Jats became so bold that they plundered right up to Agra and Delhi, way-laid convoys of grain and merchandise, and conducted a kind of guerilla war against the Imperialists.<sup>31</sup>

Farrukh Siyar was impatient at the delay, and repeatedly wrote to Jai Singh to that effect. Thus, on March 13, 1717, he wrote: "Seven months have passed since that high Raja was given charge of the destruction of the Jat villains, with a large army, a big park of artillery and copious treasure. Uptil now, the fort has not been invested (even) from one side, not to speak of its conquest. The jungle remains for half a kos around the fort, and the Jats come out under its shelter and attack the royal army. Now the rainy season is approaching fast and, it seems, will pass in the same way. If under the supervision of Raja Gaj Singh you set the army to clear the forest, and yourself devote full attention to it, the task could be accomplished in a week. If, God 28 Akhbārāt. An urgent summon was sent to Jai Singh on March 31, 1716 after the affair of Mīr Jumlah.

29 M.M. 60a-b, Akhbārāt Aug. 6, 1716. Earlier, on Jan. 1, Budh Singh had been given the zamindari of Momīdānah (Akhbārāt).

30 M.M. 60 b.

31 Wāqī'ah Papers, Kāmwar 418-20, Iqbāl 33-37.

forbid, the campaign is not finished now, once the rains begin, the mud fort will become still more difficult (to conquer)".<sup>32</sup>

However, the delay can hardly be attributed to negligence or incompetence on the part of Jai Singh. Jai Singh proceeded methodically, cutting down all trees around the fort and setting up block-houses on the road eastward to Agra. Progress was necessarily slow. It must be remembered that he was fighting against the same race and the same terrain which baffled Lord Lake in the 19th Century.

At the capital, 'Abdullāh Khān harped on the waste of men, money and material. He pointed out that two crores of rupees had already been spent and that much more was likely to be needed before the siege terminated. When the siege had lasted a year and a half, and victory was still not within sight, Farrukh Siyar felt compelled to agree to a peace with the Jats. The terms were negotiated over the head of Jai Singh, through 'Abdullāh Khān's uncle, Khān-i-Jahān, who had been sent to Thūn in November, 1716, with the ostensible purpose of helping Jai Singh, but really to thwart him. According to the terms of the treaty, the Jat leader agreed to pay 50 lakhs of rupees to the state in cash and goods, besides a private gift of 20 lakhs to the wazīr. He also surrendered Thūn, Dīg, etc., and agreed to serve wherever he was appointed.<sup>33</sup>

Farrukh Siyar yielded to 'Abdullāh Khān's demands very ungraciously, while Jai Singh felt robbed of victory which he had deemed within his grasp, and was sore and bitter on this score.

The Jat war further strained the relations between Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyids. At the same time, the alliance of the Saiyids with the Jats who were considered rebels and disturbers of the realm marked a new stage in the struggle between the parties at the court.

iii Deepening of the Political Crisis at the Court

Meanwhile, the struggle for power between Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid brothers was assuming a deeper significance.

Early in 1717, 'Ināyatullāh Khān Kashmīrī, who had gone to Mecca towards the beginning of the reign after the execution of his son, 32 J.R. (Add. Pers. ii 143).

33 Letters No. 192, Iqbāl 37-8, M.M. 84 b-86 a.

Sa'dullāh Khān, returned to the court. Farrukh Siyar was now of the opinion that it was a mistake to have rooted out the old 'Alamgīrī nobles who were experienced administrators and who could have acted as a counterpoise to the Saiyids. 'Ināyatullāh Khān "had been trained under Aurangzīb, knew the rules of business, and was spoken of as being economy-minded." Hence, at the behest of some of his advisers, Farrukh Siyar proposed to appoint him as the Dīwān-i-Tan wa Khālīṣah. He was also made the (absentee) governor of Kashmīr, and granted the rank of 4000 in April, 1717.<sup>34</sup>

In view of 'Abdullāh Khān's authority in revenue matters, 'Ināyatullāh Khān refused to accept the post of the Dīwān-i-Tan without an understanding with the wazīr. After sometime, an agreement was arrived at with the help of Ikhlaṣ Khān,<sup>34a</sup> by which 'Ināyatullāh undertook not to make any proposals or recommendations to the Emperor in revenue matters without the advice and consultation of 'Abdullāh Khān. In return, it was stipulated that 'Abdullāh Khān would come to his office in the fort at least once or twice in the week, and attend to his business personally, i.e. not leave it in the hands of Ratan Chand. Previous to this, he had not attended his office for 4-5 months on end. We are told that this was due to Farrukh Siyar's "intrigues, his irascible temper and voluptuous habits, and the consequent neglect of the administration".<sup>35</sup>

For some time, things went smoothly. But soon disagreement

<sup>34</sup> K.K. 774, M.M. 70 a. The English factor, Surman, describes him as being "an uttar enemy to Bribery." (Early Annals ii 268). I'tiṣām Khān and Rai Rāyān, who held the posts of the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah and the Dīwān-i-Tan respectively, had resigned their offices shortly before the arrival of 'Ināyatullāh Khān. The reason for this was that I'tiṣām Khān sided with the Emperor, and Rai Rāyān with the Saiyids, so that there were objections against them from both the sides, and they felt powerless.

<sup>34a</sup> Originally a Khatri, he had been converted to Islām, and held various posts under Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh. Zu'lfiqār Khān raised him to the rank of 5,000/4,000 and appointed him the Dāroghah-i-Arṣ-i-mukarrar and the Dīwān-i-Tan. After the execution of Sa'dullāh Khān, he had retired to the home of the Bārahās, and devoted himself to writing. (M.U. i 350-52. Akhbārāt).

<sup>35</sup> K.K. 774.

arose. First of all, 'Ināyatullāh, who was an admirer of Aurangzīb, produced a letter from the Sharīf of Mecca stating that the levying of jizyah was obligatory (wājib) according to the shara'.<sup>36</sup> Next, 'Ināyatullāh examined the titles to manṣabs, the calculation of salaries and the yield of jāgīrs,<sup>36a</sup> and proposed to reduce or set aside the manṣabs of "Hindus and enunchs and Kashmīrīs (who) by force and cunning had acquired manṣabs beyond their deserts and accumulated in their hands the most profitable (sair ḥāṣil) jāgīrs, with the result that there was a scarcity of jāgīrs for the others. Men of low ranks whether of the Dīwānī or the Bakhshī or the Khān Sāmānī office had become manṣabdārs and obtained jāgīrs. People belonging to old families had been reduced to the dust".<sup>37</sup>

It is probable that both the measures were motivated largely by financial considerations, and aimed at improving the pecuniary position of the state, which had deteriorated as a result of revenue-farming, the growing lawlessness and administrative laxity.<sup>38</sup> But the jizyah was odious to the Hindus who felt it to be a penalisation of faith. Besides, it affected most the petty officials and other middle class elements, since the poor were exempt from paying it, and the incidence was too light to be felt as a burden by the rich. The second measure was aimed at the very numerous class of subordinate officials which consisted mainly of Hindus and Hindustanis (i.e. Indian Muslims). These elements clamoured against the new proposals. Ratan Chand took up the cudgels on their behalf and opposed the new reforms. 'Abdullāh Khān therefore refused to implement these measures. He also showed displeasure at the re-imposition of the jizyah. Thus, the pact

36 Letters. Explaining the measure to Jai Singh, Farrukh Siyar wrote, "It is a matter of faith, I am helpless (to intervene)". V.V. 954, K.K. 772, M.M. 70 a.

36a 'Ināyatullāh examined the āwārjah and taufīh. Probably, the former was a descriptive roll of the manṣabdārs along with a record of their manṣabs, while the latter contained an assessment of the yield of jāgīrs.

37 K.K. 775, M.M. 70 a.

38 Khush-ḥāl 102. The finances of the Empire were not in order, and the pay of the soldiers was sometimes several years in arrears, so that they made incessant clamour and often insulted the men incharge. (Akhbārāt Aug. 11, 1713, K.K. 774).

with 'Ināyatullāh Khān broke down. After this, we are told, "the Hindus became hostile to 'Ināyatullāh Khān, and determined to oppose him in every way".<sup>39</sup>

By his resistance to 'Ināyatullāh's measures, 'Abdullāh Khān rallied to his side the subordinate officials, and appealed to the Hindu sentiment generally. From this time onwards, the Saiyids came to be regarded as the champions of the Hindus and the Hindustanis. However, it would not be correct to interpret the struggle at the court as primarily one between the Hindustanis and the Mughals, as contemporary and later writers often represent it to be. As has been noticed already, the Saiyid had made no attempt to monopolise the higher offices for themselves or for any group or section. Rather, they had gone out of their way to conciliate and appease the old 'Ālamgīrī nobles, and had given high posts to such individuals as M. Amīn Khān and Nizām-ul-Mulk. The struggle at the court was in reality partly a personal and partly a political struggle which cut across racial and religious groups. The main issue in the political struggle seems to have been whether an attempt was to be made to associate elements like the Marāthās and Jats in addition to the Rājput, in the higher ranks of the nobility. Fundamentally, the question was whether a political equilibrium could be created in the prevailing conditions, without sharing state power with these elements. The question was by no means a new one; it had been faced also by Aurangzīb. In Aurangzīb's life-time and after his death, the prestige of the Imperial arms had suffered, while the activities of the Marāthās, and to some extent of the Jats and the Sikhs, had assumed a ubiquitous guerilla character which rendered a quick victory impossible. The internal cohesion and stability of the Mughal government had also declined. In these circumstances and under the pressure of a hostile faction at the court, the Saiyids moved in the direction of forming an alliance with the Marāthās and the Jats as well as with many individual Rājput princes. Thus, they took a definite step towards forming a more broad based state. They realised the urgent necessity of a broad policy of religious toleration, in order to secure the good will of the Hindus generally. But the policies of the Saiyids were opposed by a group which raised the old slogan of "religion in danger", accusing the Saiyids of being pro-Hindu and of not observing the letter of the Law. They also invoked the policies of Aurangzīb, and tried to represent the Saiyid policies as dangerous innovations.

39 K.K. 775.

Thus, the struggle for power at the court gradually involved the question of the character of the state itself. The policy followed by the Saiyids was more in consonance with the liberal, tolerant spirit of Akbar, and conducive to the growth of a national state and monarchy. Their opponents sought to preserve the privileges of a comparatively narrow group, and took their stand upon the apparently orthodox and uncompromising principles of Aurangzīb. There were other points of conflict too.

In interpreting the struggle which followed it should be borne in mind that the real nature of the issues was only dimly realised by the two sides. For both of them the question of power remained the most immediate and pressing issue. In order to gain power both sides were prepared to modify the principles for which they apparently stood. Personal and group loyalties also played a part. This renders necessary the exercise of the utmost caution in judging the position of individuals and groups, and complicates the study of the more significant conflict of principles and policies.

iv The Saiyid-Marāthā Pact.

When Nizām-ul-Mulk arrived in the Deccan as the Viceroy in 1714, he refused to accept Dā'ūd Khān's agreement for the payment of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan to Shāhū, and ousted the kamā'ishdārs of Shahu from Aurangabad and several other districts.<sup>40</sup> This led to the resumption of general hostilities with the Marāthās. Nizām-ul-Mulk inflicted a couple of defeats on them, but was unable to destroy the small mud forts (garhī-chah) which they had built in every district and which served as a base of attack or a place of refuge to the Marāthā bands, and was the real basis of their system of organised plunder in the Deccan.<sup>41</sup> 40 K.K. 743, 783. It does not seem that Nizām-ul-Mulk ousted the Marāthā chauth collectors from the whole of the Deccan.

41 For a detailed description of this system, see K.K. 738, 742-3, Ḥadīqat ii 68-75. We are told that Farrukh Siyar was "not enthusiastic" about the

When Ḥusain 'Alī replaced Nizām-ul-Mulk as the Viceroy of the Deccan, he followed the same policy for some time. He refused to countenance the Marāthā claims for chauth and sardeshmukhi, and resisted them wherever he could. The result was that the Marāthās appeared everywhere and plundered and desolated every place. The Imperial commanders failed to cope with the situation. In 1715, Khāndū Dābhādē inflicted a crushing defeat on Ḥusain 'Alī's Mīr Bakhshī, Zu'lfīqār 'Alī Khān.<sup>42</sup> In retaliation, Raja Mukham Singh the dīwān of Ḥusain 'Alī, and Chandra Sen, Nīmājī etc. ravaged the Marāthā country upto the outskirts of Satārā.<sup>43</sup> But this victory did not prove of much avail to Ḥusain 'Alī for he failed to defeat and to crush the Marāthā bands which roamed over the Deccan, retiring when the Imperialists appeared in overwhelming strength, and reoccupying their former positions as soon as they withdrew. Matters were rendered more difficult for Ḥusain 'Alī by the underhand opposition of Farrukh Siyar who wrote letters to Shāhū and to all the zamindars and dīwāns in the Karnātak to oppose the Viceroy.<sup>44</sup> The result was that Ḥusain 'Alī's authority in Bijapur, Haiderābād and the two Karnātaks was reduced almost to a cypher.<sup>45</sup>

Also, contrary to the terms of the agreement of 1714, Farrukh Siyar began to interfere in matters of appointment etc. in the Deccan.<sup>46</sup>

Consequently, on the advice of Saiyid Anwar Khān, and through policy of Nizām-ul-Mulk "lest it plunge him in a sea of trouble with the Marathas" (Āṣaf Jāh, 79).

42 K.K. ii 777-8, Kāmwar entry d.2 Rabī' I yr. 5|Feb. 25, 1716, Riyasat 80-1.

43 Akhbārāt: Harkāra's report d. Feb. 19, 1717. This took place in early January. The Imperial harkāra wrote that this was the first time after the Emperor Aurangzīb's death that a royal army had penetrated upto the Marāthā capital, and that it was a warning to the villains.

S.P.D. xxx 236-40 confirm this report. Also K.K. 779, M.U. ii 331.

44 K.K. 780, Tārīkh-i-Ibrāhīmī (Rampur Ms. and Elliot viii 260), M.U. i 328.

45 K.K. 780, 787-8.

46 K.K. 773, Akhbārāt entries d. Oct. 19, 27, Nov. 22, 1715. In the 6th year, Ḥusain 'Alī had asked for and obtained confirmation of his right to appoint and dismiss all shūbahdārs, Bakhshīs, faujdārs, qil'adārs, Wāqī'-Nigārs, etc. in the Deccan (Akhbārāt May 3, 1717). For examples of Farrukh Siyar's interference, see K.K. 773, 787.

the instrumentality of Shankarājī Malhār,<sup>47</sup> Ḥusain 'Alī opened negotiations with the Marāthās. This was done sometime in the middle of 1717.<sup>48</sup> Reports of these negotiations reached the Emperor, but he was powerless to circumvent them. Ultimately, in February 1718, Ḥusain 'Alī reached an agreement with Shāhū granting him the swarajya of Shivaji with certain reservations,<sup>49</sup> and the right of collecting the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the six ṣūbahs of the Deccan through his own collectors. The recent Marāthā conquests in Berar, Gondwānā and Karnātak were also confirmed.<sup>50</sup>

In return for these concession, Shāhū agreed to pay a peshkash of 10 lakhs, to maintain a body of 15,000 horse to be placed at the disposal of the Viceroy, and "to make the country populous, to punish all malefactors. . and if any one's property should be stolen or destroyed, to get it restored and to punish the thieves and if he does not do that, to give it himself". No taxes were to be charged besides the established ones,<sup>51</sup> and it was specifically stipulated that rāhdārī was not to be charged.<sup>52</sup> For the sardeshmukhi only, Shāhū undertook to pay the 47 K.K. 784, S.P.D. vii 28. Shankarājī was originally a kārkun under Shivaji, and was, subsequently, Sachiv under Raja Ram. He retired in 1698 and settled down at Banaras. He came to Delhi and joined Ḥusain 'Alī when the latter went to the Deccan (Duff 105, 164, 171, 197-8, K.K. 784).

48 B.M. 26,606 quoted by Dr. A. G. Powar in his paper "Some Original Documents of Mughal-Marāthā Relations" in I.H.R.C. Proceedings 1940, 204-12. Several papers dated Sept. 1717, exchanged between Shāhū and Ḥusain 'Alī are quoted too.

Also Akhbārāt Dec. 8, 11, 1717.

49 In lieu of Khandesh, he was to get the adjoining districts of Pandhārpur and Trimbak (Duff i 363).

50 Copies of these sanads are given in "Sanads and Treaties" Nos. 2, 3, 4 and Dr. A. G. Powar loc. cit. 205-8. See also Duff i 363, 368-9, K.K. 784, Ḥadiqat 86, T. Ibrāhīmī (Rampur Ms., Elliot viii 260).

Riyasat (82) quotes not the terms agreed upon, but the terms set forth by Shāhū. Dr. Powar quotes a series of papers setting forth such demands. They need to be treated with caution in determining the final terms because it was the Marāthā practice to demand much more than what they hoped to get.

51 Dr. Powar loc. cit. 207. K.K. (784) says that Shāhū and his men were to share in so many other sources of Government collections that they got nearly half of the rent-roll.

52 K.K. 785. However, the Marāthās continued to collect rāhdārī as before.

peshkash customary upon a hereditary grant, viz., 651% of one year's income.<sup>53</sup>

As soon as the agreement had been concluded, Ḥusain 'Alī wrote to the Emperor for its formal ratification. But Farrukh Siyar could hardly be expected to confirm a pact clearly aimed against him. Besides, "several well-wishers of the state urged that it was not proper to admit the 'vile enemy' to be over-bearing partners in matters of revenue and government".<sup>54</sup> Hence, the proposal was rejected. Meanwhile, Shāhū gave out that the Emperor had consented to make the grants, and without waiting for the formal confirmation, started collecting his dues.<sup>55</sup> He also sent ten thousand Marāthā horsemen under Santoji and Parsoji Bhosle and Bālājī Peshwa to join the Viceroy, according to the terms of the agreement.<sup>56</sup>

There can be little doubt that the terms of the agreement with the Marāthās were against the best interests of the Empire. Ḥusain 'Alī not only conceded the claim for chauth and sardeshmukhi which was, perhaps, inevitable, but also agreed that the Marāthās should collect their dues through their own agents, thus creating an imperium in imperio. But Farrukh Siyar had clearly brought these trouble on his own head, and could hardly blame the Saiyid brothers.

v Events Leading to the Deposition of Farrukh Siyar

The conclusion of the pact between Ḥusain 'Alī and the Marāthās brought the affairs of Farrukh Siyar to a crisis. The Saiyids had now secured that superiority for which they had been manoeuvring since the 53 Dr. Powar loc. cit. 207-8. This came to Rs. 11,75,16,762, but Shāhū agreed to pay only Rs. 1,17,19,390|12|- as many district were desolate (Duff i 363, 368-9). It was stipulated that one-fourth of the sum of ten lakhs promised in lieu of the grant of swarajya was to be paid on receipt of the sanad, and the remainder on the taxes being fixed.

It does seem that these sums were ever paid. In a paper dated 1724, it was stated that Shāhū had not paid even ten lakhs till then (Dr. Powar, loc. cit., 212).

54 K.K. 786, M.U. i 329-30.

55 Rajwade iii 99-100. Ḥusain 'Alī promised to secure the royal farmān in nine months.

56 Duff i. 363.

first breach with Farrukh Siyar three years ago. Anticipating their next move, Farrukh Siyar had posted M. Amīn Khān to Malwa as early as November, 1717. The ostensible purpose of this appointment was to drive out the Marāthās who had been harrying that province for the past several years. The Emperor had written to Jai Singh "This year the Marāthās are pouring into Malwa like ants and locusts. They have reduced to dust the towns and villages by their plunder and devastation. In the royal dues, much loss has been incurred and the entire province is under siege.

"One royal servant with a mighty force will be appointed as your deputy so that the above mentioned ṣūbah may not become desolate (lit. lampless) and remain in our possession. After the victory he will be recalled".<sup>57</sup>

M. Amīn Khān wrote to Jai Singh asking for his co-operation in the chastisement of the "oppressers". But his real motive was to check Ḥusain 'Alī should he march north. Farrukh Siyar also made a number of other appointments to Ḥusain 'Alī's northern province (Burhanpur), with the intention of weakening the Saiyid hold on that province. Thus in 1718, he appointed Jān Niṣār Khān—an old noble who had exchanged turbans with 'Abdullāh Khān's father and was on friendly terms with the Saiyids, as the Governor of Burhanpur. Three 57 Letters, d. 12 Ramaṣān yr. 5|Aug. 16, 1717; Nos. 160, 187 (Misc. Papers., vol. iii), M.U. i 330.

As late as May 5, 1717, Farrukh Siyar had assured Jai Singh, "Whatever may be, I shall never take Malwa from you" (Letters). Explaining the appointment of M. Amīn he wrote to Jai Singh "M. Amīn Khān Bakhshī-ul-Mamālik 'Itimād-ud-Dāulah has been sent with a mighty force to drive out and destroy the Marāthās who have been camping in Malwa. He will give taqāvi to the subjects, and collect revenue from them without their being afraid of the looting and destruction of their villages. He has also been instructed to chastise the Afghans (who have been helping the Marāthās). He will proceed by way of Agra and will drive the Marāthās to the other side of the Narbada. A farmān has been sent to the Amīr-ul-Umarā to sent a suitable force either under the na'ib ṣūbahdār of Khandesh (Burhanpur), or of Berar (to cooperate with him)." According to K.K. (787), the ṣūbahdār of Malwa was promised to M. Amīn Khān as soon as he reached the border of Malwa. Rumour had it that the farmān of appointment had actually been made out and handed over to him secretly.

other men were appointed a little later: Ziyā-ud-Dīn Khān an Īrānī, as the Dīwān-i-Deccan in place of Diyānat Khan deceased, Jalāl-ud-Dīn Khān as the dīwān of Burhanpur, and Fazlullāh Khān as the Bakhshī of Burhanpur.

In the Deccan, it was widely rumoured that Farrukh Siyar had decided upon war against Husain 'Alī<sup>58</sup>. Hence, Husain 'Alī set aside the nominations made by the Emperor. This gave great umbrage to Farrukh Siyar, and he projected a wild plan to arrest 'Abdullāh Khān when he came to offer prayers on the occasion of 'Īd. But the secret of the plot leaked out to 'Abdullāh Khān who engaged a large number of men from all sections of the population. "Hitherto he had engaged few who were not Saiyids or inhabitants of Bārahā<sup>59</sup>." Thus, 'Abdullāh Khān was forced to extend further his connections among non-Bārahās.

In desperation, Farrukh Siyar now decided to call together some of the old grandees of the state who looked upon the Saiyids as being upstarts, resented their dominance, and disliked their policy which they regarded as being against the best interests of the Empire. Accordingly, in August-September, 1718, he summoned to the court his father-in-law, Ajit Singh, from Jodhpur, Nizām-ul-Mulk from the faujdārī of Moradabad, and Sarbuland Khān, his maternal grand-uncle, who was the governor of Bihar.<sup>60</sup> Each of these nobles was instructed to come "with a 58 It was rumoured that Jān Niṣār was coming as the advance guard of M. Amīn Khān to invade the Deccan, and that they had 150,000 sawars between them. For a while, there was wild panic at Burhanpur. Hearing of this, Jān Niṣār Khān went to Burhanpur with only a small party. Husain 'Alī heaved a sigh of relief. Jān Niṣār Khān was courteously received, but as Burhanpur was on the northern frontier, Husain 'Alī did not give him charge of that province immediately. Ziyā-ud-Dīn Khān, who carried a letter from 'Abdullāh Khān was made the Dīwān-i-Deccan. Jalāl-ud-Dīn Khān was made the dīwān of Berar, while Fazlullāh Khān was completely ignored. Even Ziyā-ud-Dīn Khān was given no real powers except that his seal was put on sanads and pay-bills. (K.K. 773, 787, 790; Siyar 409-10; M.U. iii 36).

59 M.M. 96a, K.K. 792, 770, Siyar 411.

60 Sarbuland Khān had the reputation of being a courageous soldier. As the ṣubahdār of Awadh (Apr. 1713-June 1714), he had sternly repressed its turbulent zamindars. As a result, when he was appointed to Allahabad in June 1714, the Imperial news-reporter wrote that "at the mere news large following<sup>61</sup>." We are told that "the combined strength of the various Rajas and nobles, and the personal forces (khāṣah) of Farrukh Siyar was about 70—80,000 sawārs".<sup>62</sup>

[continued]

'Abdullāh Khān's strength is variously estimated at fifteen, twenty and thirty thousand sawārs.<sup>63</sup> Thus, a combination of these three powerful figures in opposition would have placed 'Abdullāh Khān in great difficulty. But such a coalition was prevented from coming into existence of his appointment, the zamindars are returning to duty and sending their wakīls to the Khān (for the settlement of their affairs)". (Akhbārāt Sept. 24, 1714). He is said to have employed 15,000 extra sawārs and destroyed 500 fortresses while he was the governor of Allahabad (June 1714-Nov. 1715). As the Governor of Bihar (Nov. 1715-Feb. 1718), he defeated and killed Shiv Singh, the son of Dhīr, a notorious zamindar of those parts, whom no shūbahdār had been able to suppress since the days of Aurangzīb, (Akhbārāt Sept. 24, Oct. 14, 1715, Feb. 11, 1715, Dec. 16, 1716; Kāmwar 240-1).

The English factor at Patna reported that as the Governor of Bihar he managed everything himself and the diwān had not the least authority (Wilson ii 236).

- 61 Shiv Das 44 (text of the secret shuqqa of recall). Sarbuland Khān reached the court on July 8, 1718, Nizām-ul-Mulk on Sept. 24, 1718, and Ajit Singh on Aug. 30, 1718 (Akhbārāt Kāmwar). K.K. (792) states that Ajit Singh was summoned from Ahmadabad. This is not correct. Ajit Singh had been superseded in Ahmadabad in July 1717, and was at Jodhpur at the time (Mirāt ii 12).

Sarbuland Khān was told that his presence was required for advice, and also because the Emperor wanted to consult him about the mal-administration of Bengal and Orissa (Shiv Das 45).

- 62 Siyar 412. Iqbāl (102) says that Sarbuland Khān came with 50,000 sawārs, a greater number of foot and a large park of artillery. M.M. (94b) places the figure at 7,000 sawārs more foot and a large park of artillery. Qāsim supports M.M. K.K. gives no figures.

- 63 According to the English, he had 15,000 or 20,000 troops who constantly attended him (Wilson ii 95-6). K.K. (795) says that he had 20,000 troops but that they were continually increasing. M.M. (96b) says that after the Nawāb learnt of the plot to arrest him on the occasion of 'Īd (1718), he ordered 20,000 sawārs to be raised. Till then he had employed only 7-8,000 personal (khāngī) troops. This is confirmed by K.K. (792), though Siyar (412) says, "earlier he had kept not more than 4000-5000 sawārs." Shiv Das mentions 30,000 sawārs kalam-bandī (i.e. actual, not on paper only) as his strength. (Rampur Ms. 30, B.M. Ms. 96).

by various factors, not least the pusillanimity and short-sightedness of Farrukh Siyar and his advisors who were afraid that if they ousted the Saiyids with the help of these powerful nobles, it would be even more difficult to get rid of them afterwards. Hence, Farrukh Siyar picked on a newly-risen favourite, M. Murād Kāshmīrī for the post of the wazīr. Contrary to popular belief and assertions, M. Murād was not of low-birth<sup>64</sup>, but he was the usual type of courtier, i.e. a sycophant and a braggart. His rise alienated Khān-i-Daurān and the old nobles who were no more prepared to take orders from M. Murād than from Mīr Jumlah earlier.<sup>65</sup>

While the enthusiasm of Nizām-ul-Mulk and Sarbuland Khān had been thus cooled, Farrukh Siyar, in his usual heedless way, completely alienated them. He deprived Sarbuland Khān of the governorship of Bihar without conferring any new post upon him,<sup>66</sup> and took away the faujdārī of Moradabad from Nizām-ul-Mulk, converted it into a province, and conferred it upon his new favourite, M. Murād.<sup>67</sup> Thus, both these nobles became ripe for defection. ‘Abdullāh Khān played his hand cleverly and won them over by promising the Governorship of Kabul to Sarbuland Khān, and of Bihar to Nizām-ul-Mulk. Meanwhile, M. Amīn Khān, finding his means unequal to the task of checking 64 M. Murād was related to the mother of Farrukh Siyar, and had long been in Imperial service, having entered the service in the time of ‘Ālamgīr. He was an old friend of Mun‘im Khān, and in Jahāndār’s time, through the influence of Kokaltāsh Khān, he acquired the rank of 5000. After the fall of Jahāndār Shah, he joined the Saiyids, and had been in favour with Husain ‘Alī before the latter left for the Deccan (Kāmwar 428, Shiv Das 40-1, M.M. 77b, 81a, 84b. See also Irvine i 340-5).

65 M.M. 103a. Wārid (297) says that after this, Khān-i-Daurān used to carry every secret of the Emperor to the Saiyids. Kāmwar (432) remarks “from the coming to the front of ‘Itiqād Khān (M. Murād) many nobles who had been favourably inclined towards Farrukh Siyar were alienated and joined Quṭb-ul-Mulk and exerted themselves in his favour... They were extremely jealous of the promotion of ‘Itiqād Khān which seemed to them without any cause.”

66 K.K. 792, M.M. 110a. Sarbuland K. left the court on Sept. 26. He resigned his manṣab and returned to Delhi on Nov. 25 (Akhbārāt).

67 K.K. 792, 802, M.M. 110a, Kāmwar and Akhbārāt entry d. Jan. 7, 1719, Iqbāl 47.

Ḥusain 'Alī in Malwa, had left his charge and returned to the court. In exasperation, Farrukh Siyar dismissed him from his manṣab and office. But 'Abdullāh Khān intervened on his behalf also, and won him over by securing his restoration to his manṣab and office.<sup>68</sup> He also secured the support of "other fortune seekers by rendering them assistance and enquiring after their affairs". Ajit Singh had always been a partisan of the Saiyids. He had been further alienated when Farrukh Siyar dismissed him from Gujarāt on the ground of "oppression," and conferred the province on his favourite, Khān-i-Daurān.<sup>69</sup> Hence, on his arrival at the court, Ajit Singh adhered to the side of the wazīr.

Thus, by the end of 1718, Farrukh Siyar had been almost completely isolated. The only noble of consequence on his side remained Jai 67a Akhbārāt. Nizām-ul-Mulk was appointed to Bihar in Feb. 1719, and Sarbuland Khān to Kabul on Jan. 7, 1719.

68 K.K. 902. M.M. (111a) gives a somewhat different account. M. Amīn had been recalled from Malwa by Farrukh Siyar. When M. Amīn reached near Delhi, 'Abdullāh Khān expressed suspicion at his recall, and at his instance, M. Amīn was forbidden from entering Delhi and dismissed from his manṣab and office. Having thus alienated M. Amīn from Farrukh Siyar, 'Abdullāh Khān cleverly won him over to his side by having him restored. (Kāmwar, Shiv Das 44).

69 Mir'āt ii 12. This was sometime in April, 1717, when Ajit Singh had gone on a pilgrimage to Dwārakā. On Aug. 10, Ajit's son, Abai Singh had been superseded as the faujdar of Sorath (Akhbārāt).

The Rājput sources (Jodhpur Khyāt, quoted in Ojha's Marwar ii 567) ascribe this to Ajit's friendship with the Saiyid brothers, and the machinations of Jai Singh. (Reu, Jodhpur, 311).

In a letter to Jai Singh d. 4 Jamāda II yr. 6 | May 16, 1717, Farrukh Siyar gave misgovernment as the reason for Ajit Singh's supersession. "Maharaja Ajit Singh has made Gujarāt which is the pride of Hindustan (lit. its lamp and light) dead and deserted (lit. lampless) by his oppressions and excesses. Jāgīrdārs big and small, people high and low and the citizens of Ahmadabad have appealed (against him). Because the care of the world and the happiness of the people are incumbent on the sovereign, we have no alternative but to dismiss him and to appoint Ṣamsām-ud-Daulah (Khān-i-Daurān) in his place." (J.R.: Add. Pers., Vol. ii 3).

The charge of oppression against Ajit Singh seems to have been of old standing. On Aug. 22, Sept. 5 and 27, 1715, there were complaints that the Rājputs of Ajit Singh were laying their hands on the royal maḥāls and the fāgīrs of the royal manṣabadārs, and that the mutṣaddīs and Singh. A decisive section of the old nobility, including such powerful figures as M. Amīn Khān, Nizām-ul-Mulk and Sarbuland Khān had no hopes left from Farrukh Siyar, and either decided to side actively with the Saiyids, or adopted a position of neutrality in their conflict with Farrukh Siyar. Thus, the Saiyids were in a position to dictate their will to the Emperor.

The Saiyids now had three possible courses before them: first, to depose Farrukh Siyar and set themselves up as the monarchs, as had been done by successful rebels in the time of the Sultānat; second, to depose Farrukh Siyar and choose a new Timurid prince who could be relied upon to rule according to their wishes; and, third, to keep Farrukh Siyar on the throne but shear him of all power and capacity for mischief by securing control of all the offices which gave access to him. The first course was never seriously considered and was, perhaps, considered unworkable.<sup>70</sup> The choice lay between the second and the third course. ‘Abdullāh Khān, who was a shrewd politician, as is evident from his deft handling of the situation during his brother’s absence, favoured the last course. He wanted, as a contemporary writer puts it, “to treat Farrukh Siyar as Mahābat Khān had treated Jahāngīr”,<sup>71</sup> i.e. to keep him a virtual prisoner in his hands. In this way, he hoped to secure the reality of power without incurring the odium of raising their hands against the lawful sovereign.

the jāgīrdārs dared not say anything as the news-writers were in collusion with the Raja. Gulab Chand, Karorī Sair, was said to be charging 5% toll on the goods of all Muslims (also). (Akhhārāt).

70 According to a Bārahā tradition (Tārīkh-i-Sādāt-i-Būrahā, Ms. Jansāth, 300, 314) one Jalāl Khān of Muzaffarnagar or his son Diyānat Khān proposed that one of the two brothers should ascend the throne. Irvine (i 388), however, considers this story to be of doubtful veracity.

Qāsim (101) tells us that M. Amīn had declared that if the Saiyids chose to ascend the throne, he would be the first to salute them. But, says the author, “this was all a figment of his imagination: the Saiyids never laid any claims to the throne.”

Subsequent rumours that the Saiyids had formed the project of murdering all the scions of the Timurid dynasty one by one and then dividing the Empire among themselves (Aḥwāl, Irvine i 432) seem to have been so much bazar gossip.

71 Khush-hāl 416 (Sarkar Ms.).

Early in 1718, 'Abdullāh Khān had written to Ḥusain 'Alī to come to the north at once, as his relations with the Emperor were worsening daily and he was in fear of his life.<sup>72</sup> In September 1718, Farrukh Siyar recalled Mīr Jumlah from Lahore. As this was a breach of the agreement made with Ḥusain 'Alī, the latter now had a valid excuse for marching to Delhi. In October 1718, Ḥusain 'Alī left Aurangabad. At Burhānpur he was joined by a Marāthā army of 10,000 horse under Peshwa Bālājī Vishwanath, the combined forces of Ḥusain 'Alī and the Marāthās numbering about 25,000 horse and 10,000 foot. The ostensible pretext for coming to the court without permission was that a (fictitious) son of Prince Akbar had been handed over by Shāhū and it was necessary to escort him to Delhi.<sup>73</sup>

Ḥusain 'Alī, who was of a haughty and impatient temperament, had already made up his mind for the deposition of Farrukh Siyar. This decision was known in his inner most circle by the time he reached near Delhi.<sup>74</sup> He entered Delhi with drums beating like an independent sovereign, defying imperial etiquette, and repeatedly said that he no longer reckoned himself among the servants of the monarch, adding "I will maintain the honour of my race and care neither for the loss of my manṣab nor for royal censure".<sup>75</sup>

A tussle now began between 'Abdullāh Khān and Ḥusain Alī. On February 19, a conference was held by Ḥusain 'Alī, 'Abdullāh Khān, Ajit Singh and Bhim Singh Hārā, and it was decided that the Saiyids should demand the posts of the Dāroghah-i-Dīwān-i-Khāṣ and Mīr Ātish before Ḥusain 'Alī would go to the fort for an audience with the 72 See copy of the letter in Shiv Das (Rampur Ms. 41-5). 'Abdullāh Khān wrote that Farrukh Siyar had demanded the surrender of Ratan Chand and Chūrāman, and made an attempt on his life.

73 Iqbāl 49-50, K.K. 793, 795. In April 1714 and 1717, the Akhbārūt had brought news of disturbance in the Deccan created by a suppositious son of Prince Akbar.

74 K.K. 825. It is alleged that Ratan Chand was among those who instigated Ḥusain 'Alī against Farrukh Siyar (K.K. 805), but it is not known if he advised deposition.

75 Shiv Das 58, K.K. 804, M.U. i 330. Ḥusain 'Alī's troops destroyed the crops and looted the bazars like a hostile army. In particular, the country of Jai Singh was thoroughly ravaged. These facts were brought to the notice of Farrukh Siyar but he could do nothing about them.

Emperor, and hand over the captive prince to him. The Saiyids also demanded that Jai Singh should be ordered to leave for Amber, that the other posts which gave access to the Emperor—such as the post of the Dāroghah-i-Khawāṣṣān—should also be filled by their nominees, and that the fort should be placed under their control at the time of the interview.<sup>76</sup> On February 20, on the advice of his favourite, I'tiqād Khān (M. Murād Kashmīrī), Farrukh Siyar decided to yield to the demands of the Saiyids, Jai Singh was asked to leave for Amber, and the posts of the Dāroghah-i-Dīwān-i-Khāṣ, Mīr Ātish, Dāroghah-i-Khawāṣṣān, Dāroghah-i-Jilau, (Supt. of the Royal attendants and the Special Retinue) and the Nāẓir-i-Ḥaram were conferred upon the nominees of the Saiyids. However, Farrukh Siyar made the proviso, that the old incumbents should continue to hold office as deputies, till Nauroz, which was about a month off.<sup>77</sup>

The departure of Jai Singh was followed by the defeat of his protégé, Budh Singh, at the hands of Bhim Singh who had allied himself with the Saiyids. On February 22, Ḥusain 'Alī had an interview with the Emperor after posting his men at all strategic points in the fort. But the differences between the two sides could not be bridged. The Saiyids were impatient at the delay in the handing over of the actual charge of the various offices to their nominees, and suspected that Farrukh Siyar was only playing for time in order that he might resort to some new trick.

Hence, they refused the proffered compromise. On February 26, 'Abdullāh Khān had a stormy interview with Farrukh Siyar during which the latter refused to make any further concessions, openly abused the wazīr, and retired into the ḥaram. 'Abdullāh Khān thereupon turned out the Royal favourite, I'tiqād Khān, and all the Royal guards from the fort, and took possession of it.

76 M.M. (Sarkar Ms.) 238, K.K. 805, Qāsim 97, M.U. iii 135. Amīn-ud-Dīn Sambhalī got a message from a friend who had direct access to the Saiyids that the conference had decided to depose Farrukh Siyar and to raise a captive Prince to the throne. Accordingly, Amīn-ud-Dīn wrote a strong letter to Farrukh Siyar advising military resistance to the Saiyids.

77 M.M. 238, K.K. 806, Irvine i 375. The ṣūbahdārīs of Lahore and Agra were conferred on the Saiyid nominees at the same time.

78 K.K. 807, M.M. 239, Shiv Das 59, Qāsim 145-6, Irvine i 377-8.

In spite of this break, 'Abdullāh Khān was in favour of keeping Farrukh Siyar on the throne and maintaining the khutbah and sikkah in his name, since all the important offices were in their hands or, he felt confident, would soon be. He sent messages to the effect to his brother,<sup>79</sup> and repeatedly asked Farrukh Siyar to come out of the ḥaram and dismiss their remaining opponents. Farrukh Siyar refused. Meanwhile, wild rumours of the death of 'Abdullāh Khān and Ḥusain 'Alī at the hands of Ajit Singh, M. Amīn and others spread in the town, and several nobles took courage to come out in defence of the monarch. The Marāthās troops of Ḥusain 'Alī clashed with the Mughal troops of M. Amīn Khān, and were assailed by the riff-raff in the city and the unemployed Mughal soldiers. After about 2,000 of them had been slain, they were compelled to leave the town.<sup>80</sup> Though militarily ineffective, this demonstration of popular attachment to the house of Timur confronted the Saiyids with the danger of a sudden landslide against them, and impressed upon them the urgent necessity of making a decision quickly, specially as Jai Singh was hovering 40 miles from Delhi with 20,000 horsemen.

Hāshim 'Alī Khān, Ikhlāṣ Khān and M. Amīn Khān, who held frequent consultations with Ḥusain 'Alī, advised the deposition of Farrukh Siyar.<sup>81</sup> M. Amīn Khān had already given this advice to Ḥusain 'Alī a few days earlier. Opinion now veered round in favour of deposition. Even Khān-i-Daurān and Ajit Singh gave the same advice.<sup>82</sup> Ḥusain 'Alī sent a peremptory note to 'Abdullāh Khān asking him to finish the job in hand or come out of the fort, and let him (Ḥusain 'Alī) take over. As Farrukh Siyar refused to come out of the ḥaram and comply with 'Abdullāh Khān's demands, 'Abdullāh Khān had no option but to bow down to the recommendation of all his associates in favour of deposition. A party of Afghans was sent into the ḥaram. They dragged Farrukh Siyar out, blinded him and threw him into jail. A youth of 20 years, Rafī'ud-Darjāt, was proclaimed the Emperor.

79 Khush-hāl 416, Qāsim 150, Ḥadīqat 89, M.M. 263. (Sarkar Ms.).

80 K.K. 812-3, M.M. (Sarkar Ms.) 262-3, Qāsim 102—figures probably much exaggerated.

81 M.M. 263, Khush-hāl 416, Qāsim 99, Ḥadīqat 89, M.U. iii. 135.

82 M.M. 263, Qāsim 99. Khush-hāl 416, Wārid 309, K.K. 814-6.

Shortly afterwards, on April 29, 1719, Farrukh Siyar was murdered and buried in the crypt of Humāyūn's tomb.

'Abdullāh Khān afterwards regretted the deposition of Farrukh Siyar, and blamed his brother for his haste. Farrukh Siyar's preference for sycophants and upstarts had prevented the old nobles from forming a coalition to oust the Saiyids. In destroying Farrukh Siyar, the Saiyids had thus destroyed their most effective shield against the old nobles. The political, economic and administrative problems facing the empire had become more acute during the preceding period of factionalism and misgovernment, and these the Saiyids were now called upon to solve. The ability of the Saiyids to hold power would depend largely upon their success in devising satisfactory solutions to the problem posed by the old nobles, and the various problems inherited from the preceding rulers. They were thus faced with a situation of stupendous difficulty.

CHAPTER VI

THE SAIYID "NEW" WIZĀRAT

i Powers and Position of the Saiyids.

After deposing Farrukh Siyar and setting up a new monarch, the Saiyid brothers distributed among their nominees all the posts which gave direct access to the Emperor. The Dāroghah-i-Dīwān-i-Khāṣ, the Dāroghah-i-Ghusal-Khānah, the Nāẓir-i-Haram, and even the eunuchs and personal attendants of the Emperor were hand-picked by the Saiyids. Saiyid Himmat Khān Bārahā was nominated the guardian (atāliq) of the Emperor, and it is said, without his orders even the food of the Emperor could not be served. The Emperor could not talk to any noble unless his "guardian" or one of the Saiyid brothers was present. Whenever the Emperor went out for public prayers or for hunting, a select body of Bārahās surrounded him. Thus, the Emperor lost all personal liberty, and all access to him was controlled by the Saiyid brothers.<sup>1</sup> This was considered necessary because, in a great measure, the power of the Saiyids rested on the control of the Emperor's person.

This state of affairs continued under Rafī'ud-Daulah who succeeded Rafī'ud-Darjāt after the latter's death from consumption on June 11, 1719. But Rafī'ud-Daulah also succumbed to the same disease, and on September 28, 1719, the Saiyids raised Muḥammad Shāh, the son of Jahān Shāh who was the youngest son of Bahādur Shāh to the throne. On Muḥammad Shāh's accession, a slight relaxation of control was made, and the hereditary door-keepers and attendants etc. were allowed to return to their former posts. But in all matters of state the Emperor continued to be powerless.<sup>2</sup>

But apart from those posts which gave access to the Emperor, the Saiyids followed a policy of effecting as few changes as possible.

1 K.K. 816, 818, 831, 842; Kāmwar 410, 413; T. Muḡ. 218, 224; Siyar 420, Āshūb 151, Wārid 312.

2 Kāmwar 413, Irvine i 416.

In the provinces, most of the governors and other officers were confirmed in their previous posts.<sup>3</sup> This was done in order to restore law and order rapidly, to screen the violent transfer of power at the centre and to reconcile the old nobles to the new set up.

At the court, the property and manṣabs of a number of the personal favourites of Farrukh Siyar—such as Muḥammad Murād Kāshmīrī, Amīn-ud-Dīn Sambhalī, Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Aḥmad Beg, and the Emperor's relations like Sa'adat Khān, Shā'istah Khān, etc., were confiscated. But the property of many more was spared.<sup>4</sup> There were no bloody executions, and even some of the close favourites of the late Emperor such a Khān-i-Daurān and Mīr Jumlah, were left in possession of their manṣabs and jāgīr and given employment. In general, the Saiyids made no attempt to monopolise the high offices of state. M. Amīn Khān continued to be the second Bakhshī, another Tūrānī, Roshan-ud-Daulah Zafar Khān was made the third Bakhshī, and even 'Ināyatullāh Khān, whose policies had been strongly opposed by the Saiyids, was allowed to continue as the Khān-i-Sāmān and the (absentee) governor of Kashmir. The post of Ṣadr was given to Amīr Khān, an old 'Ālamgīrī noble, and then to Mīr Jumlah. Apart from the two highest offices of state and the viceroyalty of the Deccan which the Saiyids held since 1715, and the offices which controlled access to the Emperor, the only new posts given to Bārahās or the personal employees and dependents of the Saiyids were the ṣūbahdārīs of Agra and Allahabad, and the faujdārī of Moradabad.<sup>6</sup>

But the Saiyids had yet to stabilise their power. Two things were 3 Kāmwar 422, T. Muḥ. 218, Irvine i 404.

4 Thus, M.M. (120a) states that except for some people like M. Murād Kāshmīrī, "all manṣabdārīs, imperial servants and jāgīrdārīs were given sanands of confirmation and even the wālāshāhīs of the late Emperor were retained".

Kāmwar (441), however, says that "the manṣabs of more than 200 manṣabdārīs of the time of 'Ālamgīr, Bahādur Shāh and Farrukh Siyar were confiscated, and distributed by the two brothers among their followers". K.K. is silent, but Siyar (420) as also Iqbāl (138) follow M.M.

5 Kāmwar 444. Mīr Jumlah was made the Ṣadr on Oct. 21, 1719 and continued to occupy the post till his death on Jan. 3, 1732. (Tārīkh-i-Muḥammadi).

6 Agra was given to S. Ghairat K., the cousin of the two brothers.

[continued]

necessary for this: first, to gain effective control of all parts of the empire so as to deny a rallying centre to their opponents; and, second, to organise a strong bloc of supporters to maintain their position in the face of possible opposition from rival sections inside the nobility.

ii Early Revolts against the Saiyids.

In spite of the conciliatory policy adopted by the Saiyids, two centres of resistance and overt challenge to their authority were rapidly formed: the first at Agra, and the second at Allahabad.

The revolt at Agra was organised by an adventurer named Mitr Sen<sup>7</sup> and a couple of his associates whose primary objective was to take advantage of the disturbed condition of the empire to gain wealth and position for themselves. To achieve this, they proclaimed as Emperor a scion of the Timurid dynasty, Nekū Siyar, who was a prisoner in the Agra fort. By themselves, the rebels had little power or importance, but the Saiyids were afraid that Nekū Siyar might become the rallying centre of all elements hostile to them. Rumour was rife that Nizām-ul-Mulk, Jai Singh, and Chhabelā Ram Nāgar, the governor of Allahabad, were coming to the aid of Nekū Siyar. Nekū Siyar's partisans appealed for help not only to these nobles but also to the Afghans and the local zamindars.<sup>8</sup> Jai Singh had actually moved out several stages from Amber and was camping at Toda Tank, 80 kos from Agra. After Shāh 'Alī K. was appointed to Allahabad after Girdhar Bahādūr has been ejected from it. Ajmer, however, was taken from S. Khān-i-Jahān Bārahā the uncle of the Saiyids, and given to Ajit Singh. Saif-ud-Dīn 'Alī K. the younger brother of 'Abdullāh K. and Husain 'Alī, was made the saujdar of Moradabad. S. Najm-ud-Dīn 'Alī K. was the Mir Ātish for sometime, but the post was soon given to S. Šalābat K. a protégé of Khān-i-Daurān, and after his death, to Haider Qulī Khān (Kāmwar).

7 An employee of Nekū Siyar, he was reputed to have had some knowledge of medicine, and to have made his fortune by money-lending. It was this obscure figure who now proclaimed Nekū Siyar the Emperor, and became his wazīr, with the title of Raja Birbal and the rank of 7000 (K.K. 825, Kāmwar).

8 Shiv Das 71.

the deposition of Farrukh Siyar, many nobles such as Taqarrub Khān, Shā'istah Khān, etc had taken shelter with Jai Singh to await the turn of the times. Amber had thus become a centre of opposition to the Saiyids. It was feared that many other nobles who had joined the Saiyids at the last moment would also go over to Jai Singh.<sup>9</sup>

However, the rebellion failed to spread beyond Agra and did not receive any support from the high grandees. Even Nizām-ul-Mulk, who passed Agra enroute to Malwa, gave no help.<sup>10</sup> Mitr Sen appealed to the Saiyid brothers and other prominent nobles to accept Nekū Siyar as the Emperor, and 'Abdullāh Khān was said to be in favour of accepting the suggestion. But Husain 'Alī, considering it a personal affront, declined, and resorted to stern measures.

The Allahabad rebellion was due to the personal apprehensions of Chhabelā Ram, an old servant of Farrukh Siyar and the governor of Allahabad. He suspected the intentions of the Saiyids towards him, and his suspicions were strengthened when the Saiyids attempted to displace him from Allahabad, and sent a force under Shāh 'Alī Khān with instructions to seize the fort. In reality, the Saiyids had no desire to destroy Chhabelā Ram, but they considered his possession of such a strong fort as Allahabad dangerous, especially as it lay athwart the route from which the vital Bengal treasures came to Delhi.<sup>12</sup> They were even prepared to grant Awadh to Chhabelā Ram,<sup>13</sup> in exchange for the ṣūbahdārī of Allahabad, but the latter refused to place any trust in their word, and rose in open revolt (August 1719). Soon afterwards, 9 K.K. 832, Kāmwar 430. To check Jai Singh, 'Abdullāh K. appointed Nuṣrat Yār Khān Bārahā to go and sit at Kālādham (Bālmukhundnūmah, letter No. 23). Husain 'Alī had appointed S. Dilāwar 'Alī K. for the purpose.

10 K.K. 827-8, 832, Shiv Das 79-80.

12 The Bengal treasure had been the mainstay of the Delhi Government even towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign. At the time of Chhabelā Ram's rebellion, a convoy of 90 lakhs was waiting at Patna. The financial affairs of the brothers were not too good, as is evident from letters written at this time by 'Abdullāh K. to Chhabelā Ram asking him to escort the treasure beyond his borders as the soldiers had not received their salaries for years (Bāl. 7, 27).

13 Bāl. Nos. 3, 8; Shiv Das 76.

Chhabelā Ram died. But the rebellion was continued by his nephew, Girdhar Bahadur.

These two rebellions occupied all the energies of the two brothers during the first fourteen months of their domination. It took three months of siege before hunger and treachery brought about the surrender of Agra (August 12, 1719). Another nine months were spent in negotiations and warfare with Girdhar Bahadur before he agreed to evacuate Allahabad (May 11, 1720). The terms granted to the latter were generous and practically the same as had been proffered to him even before the commencement of the hostilities. He was granted the governorship of Awadh with all the jāgīrs dependent on it, and two or three other important faujdārīs which he desired to possess, with an additional gift of rupees thirty lakhs as im'ām.<sup>14</sup> It is significant that even then Girdhar Bahadur refused to place any reliance in the words of the Saiyid brothers, and stipulated that Ratan Chand should be the guarantor and intermediary.<sup>15</sup>

iii Political Problems of the Saiyids.

These developments could not fail to reflect unfavourably on the military power of the Saiyids. The Saiyids could not afford protracted military operations, and needed to proceed cautiously, so that the coalition which had brought about the deposition of Farrukh Siyar might be maintained and consolidated. This implied two things: first, the consolidation and extension of the alliance with the Marāthās and Rājput̃s; and second, the solution of what might be called "the problem of the 'Ālamgīrī nobles".

Active attempts were made by the Saiyids to consolidate their alliance with the Rājput̃s and the Marāthās, and to appease "Hindu opinion" generally. Immediately after the deposition of Farrukh Siyar, the jizyah was abolished once again at the request of Raja Ajit Singh.<sup>16</sup> As a further gesture of goodwill, Ajit Singh's daughter who had been married to Farrukh Siyar after being duly converted to Islam, was allowed to renounce her new faith and return to her home with her father, taking all her wealth and property with her. This step, which Khāfī Khān calls "unprecedented," caused great indignation among a section of the Muslims in the capital, and specially among the Qāzīs who ruled that it was illegal to renounce Islam. But the Saiyids, paid no heed to them.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Shiv Das 68; K.K. 846; Bāl. Nos. 8, 19, 4; T. Muz. 230.

<sup>15</sup> K.K. 838.

<sup>16</sup> Kāmwar 442, K.K. 816, Reu, Hist. of Marwar, 314. (letter from the Maharana), Mirāt ii 23, Tod i 424.

Jai Singh Sawai had always been hostile to the Saiyids. He had actually come out of Amber with the intention of supporting the rebellion at Agra. He had also given shelter to certain nobles who had fled from Delhi with rebellious intentions.<sup>18</sup> Yet, through Ajit Singh, the Saiyids opened negotiations with him. At last, after the fall of Agra and under threat of an invasion from Ḥusain 'Alī, Jai Singh withdrew from Toda Tank. The Saiyids decided to be generous, and Jai Singh was granted a large sum of money and the faujdārī of Sorath in Ahmadabad. Ajmer, which was considered to be a most important charge and entrusted only to the highest grandees and generally to Muslim nobles only on account of its religious associations, was granted to Ajit Singh along with the ṣūbah of Gujarāt.<sup>19</sup> Other honours were also conferred on the Raja who thus became one of the most powerful and influential nobles in the Empire. The two Rājput Rajas together constituted a very powerful faction in the empire. The returning confidence felt by the Hindus is reflected in Khāfī Khān's "complaint" that "from the environs of the capital to the banks of the Narbada, the infidels were engaged in repairing temples and attempting to forbid cow-slaughter".<sup>20</sup>

The Saiyids continued to make attempts through Ajit Singh to win

17 K.K. 833, T. Muḡ.

18 These were Rūhullāh K. II who had been appointed the faujdār of Aḥmadabād, Tahawwur Khān, Tūrānī and S. Ṣalābat Khān, the brother-in-law of Farrukh Siyar, who had been the Mīr Ātish. (K.K. 832, Kāmwar).

19 K.K. 838. Elliot (vii 485) has confused Sorath with Surat. The farmān of Jai Singh's appointment is dated 19 Zūḥijjah 1132 [Nov. 2, 1719 (Reu, Marwar, 318)].

20 K.K. 860. No formal order prohibiting cow-slaughter was passed by the Saiyids, but on his own responsibility Ajit Singh prohibited it in the two ṣūbahs under his charge, an action which Khāfī Khān says "exceeded his authority". [K.K. 936, T. Hindī 43b (B.M. Ms.)].

over Jai Singh actively to their side. At their instances, Ajit Singh met Jai Singh at Manoharpur, and took him to Jodhpur where he was fêted and feasted.<sup>21</sup> Shortly afterwards, Ajit Singh gave one of his daughters to him in marriage.<sup>22</sup> Some tangible accord might have resulted from all this had the Saiyids remained in power longer. For the moment, Jai Singh refused a request by Nizām-ul-Mulk for joint action against the Saiyids,<sup>23</sup> but did not join the Saiyids either. The Saiyid pact with the Rājapūts, therefore, touched only Ajit Singh.

The pact with the Marāthās was strengthened by the formal grant, under Imperial signature, of the sanads for sardeshmukhi and chauth.<sup>24</sup> Within a month of Farrukh Siyar's deposition, the Marāthā troops which Husain 'Alī had brought with him from the Deccan left Delhi, taking with them the sanads and the family of Shāhū. Though comparatively cheap,<sup>25</sup> these troops were unpopular with the Delhi populace and the North Indians generally. Hence, the Saiyids were not keen to detain them at Delhi more than was absolutely necessary. Although no Marāthā soldiers now remained in North India, Marāthā support continued to be the mainstay of the Saiyid power in the Deccan. 'Ālam 'Alī, Husain 'Alī's deputy in the Deccan, was virtually under the guardianship of Shankarājī Malhār, who had been the minister of 21 Bāl. 11-12, Reu, Marwar 318-20. Ajit met Jai Singh at Kālā Pahār in Nov. 1719 and is mentioned as having signed a treaty with him on 22 Rajab|Apr. 31, 1720. (Bāl. 5, 31).

22 Ojha, Marwar, 588. But according to Bāl. (Nos. 5, 11, 31), it was Ajit Singh who was married at this time, though the identity of the bride is not mentioned.

23 Āsaf Jah 113.

24 Copies in B.M. Ms. 26, 216 quoted by Dr. A. G. Powar in the I.H.R.C. XVII Session, loc. cit. The sanads in question are dated the first year of Muḥammad Shāh's reign. As M. Shāh's reign had not commenced by then, and it could not be foreseen that his reign would be pre-dated to commence from Farrukh Siyar's deposition, these sanads must have been confirmatory sanads granted by the Saiyids after Muḥammad Shāh ascended the throne. See also Duff i 368-9.

25 Marāthā soldiers were paid at the rate of -|8|- daily, whereas the average pay of a trooper under the Saiyids was Rs. 50|- p.m. (Riyasat 92-3, Iqbāl 128).

Raja Ram at one time. It is said that Husain 'Alī had instructed 'Ālam 'Alī to follow Shankarājī's advice in all matters, and as the latter had many connections with the Satārā court, good relations with Shāhū were thus assured.<sup>26</sup>

It was not only among the Rājput̃s and the Marāthās that the Saiyids sought to extend their connections. They sought to bind Chūrāman Jat still closer to themselves by further concessions. He was given charge of the royal highway from Delhi to Gwālioar and took part in the siege of Agra, receiving favours for his services.<sup>27</sup>

That the Saiyids had no intention of seeking any narrow monopoly of political power, or of following a policy of racial or religious exclusion is amply born out not only by the foregoing instances, but also by their attitude towards the nobles belonging to the time of 'Ālamgīr and Bahādur Shāh. As in the earlier period, the Saiyids attempted to win this section over to their side and to secure their co-operation in the task of administration by granting them increments in rank and honour, and by appointing them to high offices. Thus, most of the old encumbents were confirmed in their previous offices. In a letter to Nizām-ul-Mulk, 'Abdullāh Khān explained his general policy in the following words: "The high and mighty task of administering Hindustan in not one that can be accomplished single-handed, without the help of prominent nobles and officers of state. Under the circumstances, is it better that I should bring forward new (untried) men and become dependent on them, or that I should continue to take the help of one like you who has ever been a friend"?<sup>28</sup>

However, in seeking to translate this policy into practise, the Saiyids faced a number of serious difficulties, such as the fears and suspicions roused by the deposition of Farrukh Siyar, the jealousy and resentment of some of the old nobles at the domination exercised by two such comparative new comers as the Saiyid brothers, the ambition

26 Burhān-ul-Futūḥ 167 a, Khush-hāl.

27 Shiv Das 69, Kāmwar 423.

28 Bāl. 2. The letter was written sometime in 1720 when Nizām-ul-Mulk was the Governor of Malwa.

'Abdullāh Khān used to say, "We are three brothers of whom Nizām-ul-Mulk is the eldest and Husain 'Alī the youngest." (Ḥadīqat).

of individuals like M. Amīn Khān and Nizām-ul-Mulk who desired to exercise supreme power, or to carve out separate spheres of influence for themselves, the vaulting ambition of the Marāthās, and, finally, growing differences between the two brothers over both personal and political matters.

The differences between the brothers related to the sharing of the spoils of victory, and of political power. They also differed over the attitude to be adopted towards the old nobles in general, and Nizām-ul-Mulk in particular. Ḥusain 'Alī charged that 'Abdullāh Khān had taken advantage of his position inside the fort to take possession of all the buried treasures of Farrukh Siyar, and the goods in his jewel-house, imperial establishments etc. He also objected to the fact that 'Abdullāh Khān had resumed the jāgīrs of more than 200 Farrukh Shāhī and other nobles and distributed them among his followers. For sometime, there was great tension and even talk of fighting between the brothers till Ratan Chand brought about an agreement by pointing to the "Tūrānī" danger.<sup>29</sup>

After the capture of Agra, the lion's share of the booty was appropriated by Ḥusain 'Alī. 'Abdullāh Khān moved from Delhi on the pretext of barring Jai Singh's advance from Amber, but really in order to claim a share in the booty. Once again, Ratan Chand brought out a settlement, but 'Abdullāh Khān was not satisfied with his share of the booty.<sup>30</sup> Hence, each of the brothers wanted to lead the campaign against Allahabad personally. Ultimately, as a compromise, the command had to be entrusted to Ratan Chand.

Underneath these differences lay a subtle struggle for power between the two brothers. Ḥusain 'Alī was much more energetic than 'Abdullāh Khān, and he rapidly out-classed the latter in the exercise of real power. But he was of a hot and hasty temperament, and failed to weigh the situation carefully before coming to a decision, and did not penetrate to 29 Kāmwar 441-442.

30 The booty is placed at one crore by T. Muḥ. (229), Rs. 1,80,00,000 by Shiv Das (73), and two to three crores by K.K. (837).

At the intervention of Ratan Chand, 'Abdullāh Khān received 21 or 28 lakhs, supposed to represent his share of the booty after deducting the expenses. 'Abdullāh Khān felt cheated. (Qasim 117-8, M.U. i 331).

the heart of a problem. As Khāfī Khān says, "He (Ḥusain 'Alī) deemed himself superior in military and governmental matters to his brother, though he was forgetful of the real matter and unacquainted with strategem.

"In his judgement it seemed that there were sufficient administrators with him and his brother, and as his adopted son, 'Ālam 'Alī, was acting as the ṣūbahdār of the Deccan with a sufficient army, it would be well to send Nizām-ul-Mulk to be the ṣūbahdār of Malwa, (which was half-way between Delhi and the Deccan)".<sup>31</sup>

Thus, Ḥusain 'Alī greatly over-estimated the strength and stability of their position, and failed to appreciate sufficiently the wisdom and moderation of 'Abdullāh Khān's policy. The subsequent misfortunes of the Saiyids were due, in good part, to the unseemly haste of Ḥusain 'Alī in attempting to put down all potential rivals, and the resentment caused by his arrogant and untactful behaviour.<sup>32</sup> 'Abdullāh Khān had suggested that Nizām-ul-Mulk should be appointed the Governor of Bihar, which was a province with notoriously turbulent zamindars and which yielded little money. In this way, 'Abdullāh Khān wanted to remove Nizām-ul-Mulk from the court, and appoint him to a place where he would be worried by lack of money and of suitable means and material. He could then be dealt with later, as the situation required. But at Ḥusain 'Alī's instance, the appointment was cancelled and Nizām-ul-Mulk was appointed to Malwa instead. Nizām-ul-Mulk accepted the appointment on a promise by the Saiyids that the province would never be taken away from him—at any rate, not for a long time. He left Delhi in March, 1719, accompanied by his son, Mughal Khān, and more than a thousand manṣabdārs who also took their families with them at his instance. He refused to leave his son behind at the court as his wakīl, despite repeated requests from the Saiyids.<sup>33</sup>

It is apparent that Nizām-ul-Mulk trusted the Saiyids as little as

31 K.K. 847.

32 Thus, it is said that on one occasion he boasted that anyone at whom he cast the shadow of his shoe would become the equivalent of Emperor 'Ālamgīr. On another occasion, he ignored court etiquette and sat down in the presence of the Emperor without his permission. (Yahyā 125 a, K.K. 821).

33 K.K. 847, 858.

the Saiyids trusted him, and that a showdown between the two was inevitable sooner or later. For the Saiyids, however, the problem represented by Nizām-ul-Mulk was not one of dealing with an individual only. The problem of Nizām-ul-Mulk was, to some extent, the problem of the bulk of the old nobility belonging to the time of 'Ālamgīr and Bahādur Shāh. Many of these nobles prided themselves on their Īrānī and Tūrānī ancestry. Even though most of them had been settled in India for several generations, and assumed a superior air towards the Indians, or the Hindustan-zā, i.e. Muslims born in India. These nobles, and specially the Tūrānīs, attempted to identify themselves with the Mughal monarchy and tacitly claimed a monopoly of political power—a claim which was hardly supported by the practise of the Great Mughals. These proud nobles felt a sense of humiliation at their domination by a section of the despised Hindustani nobles.<sup>34</sup> Many of them resented the growing alliance of the Saiyids with the Rājputs and Marāthās and their attempt to mollify Hindu opinion by abolishing the jizyah and other discriminatory cesses. Still others may have felt the Saiyid rule a barrier to the fulfilment of their own individual ambitions. These various sections had not really reconciled themselves to the Saiyid domination but were watching the developments, and awaiting a favourable opportunity to strike a blow against them. In these circumstances, an attempt on the part of the Saiyids to take a strong attitude towards Nizām-ul-Mulk stood in danger of being interpreted by these nobles as part and parcel of a policy designed to 34 Thus, Khāfī Khān observes: "The two Saiyids, the real rulers, thought themselves masters of the pen and sword, and as opposed to their judgement and the sword of the Bārahās, the Mughals of Īrān and Turan were as nobodies. They did not remember that these Mughals had come a thousand or two thousand miles from their natives countries and that by courage and sound judgement, the wide realms of Hindustan had been won for the Emperor Babar by hard fighting. For two hundred years they had lived in favour of the House of Taimur and they now felt the ignominy of their Emperor being without any power in the state." (K.K. 905, 860).

cf. also the remarks of Āshūb 153-54, 139.

On the other hand, Rustam 'Alī says, "Many Hindi and Tūrānī nobles were opposed to Husain 'Alī Khān due to personal grudge and jealousy". (T. Hindī 469).

root out all the old nobles. This was a risk which the Saiyids could ill afford to take, because the alternative course was to bring forward new, untried men which created the danger of a breakdown of the administration, and an opportunity to the Rājputs, Marāthās, Jats etc. to augment their power.

Unfortunately for the Saiyids, events so shaped themselves that they were drawn to take the very step they wished to avoid most, viz. the driving of Nizām-ul-Mulk into open rebellion.

iv The Revolt of Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Downfall of the Saiyids.

Ever since Nizām-ul-Mulk had taken charge of Malwa, reports had been pouring in that he was collecting men and materials of war in excess of his requirements as the governor, and that he had his eye on the Deccan. When questioned by the Saiyids, Nizām-ul-Mulk explained his action by pointing to the necessity of checking the Marāthās who were harrying the province with 50,000 horse.<sup>35</sup> The Saiyids, however, suspected that Nizām-ul-Mulk had other intentions. Nor were these suspicions unreasonable on their part, because from Malwa Nizām-ul-Mulk had sent his son, Mughal Khān, to Jai Singh Sawai to concert measures against the Saiyids. The Saiyids also had some other complaints against Nizām-ul-Mulk—notably about the employment of one Marḥamat Khān whom Ḥusain ‘Alī had dismissed from the post of the qila’dār of Mandu for his negligence in not attending upon him when he passed that fort on his way to Delhi in 1719. Nizām-ul-Mulk’s employment of Marḥamat Khān was considered by the Saiyids to be a defiance of their authority.<sup>36</sup> The Saiyids had also complained to Nizām-ul-Mulk about his ravaging certain villages, transferring the zamindar of pargana Nilam against their wishes, etc.<sup>37</sup>

35 Shiv Das 79-80 (Nizām’s letter to ‘Abdullāh), K.K. 851.

36 K.K. 849, 858, Siyar 425, Iqbāl 56-66. K.K. suggests that the Saiyids were afraid of the military capacity and reputation which Marḥamat had earned in Malwa, and wanted a pretext to remove him from Nizām-ul-Mulk’s employment. But T. Muḥ. (232) says that Ḥusain ‘Alī considered Marḥamat’s employment a defiance of their authority.

37 Bāl. 31, K.K. 851.

They also suspected Nizām-ul-Mulk of having instigated the uprising of Nekū Siyar.<sup>38</sup>

But these complaints might not have led to an open breach with Nizām-ul-Mulk had other more urgent considerations not intervened. It seems that Ḥusain 'Alī was desirous of governing the Deccan along with Malwa, Gujarāt, Ajmer and Agra personally and that for this purpose he wanted to make Malwa his headquarters.<sup>39</sup> The reasons for this were two-fold. In the first place, the Saiyids apprehended danger from the Marāthās, and, it seems, wanted to maintain a stricter control on the affairs of the Deccan than was possible from Delhi. We are told that at the time of his visit to Delhi in 1719, Bālājī Vishwanāth had been instructed by Shāhū to secure the cessation of the forts of Daulatabad and Chanda, recognition of certain conquests of Parsoji Bhonsle in Berar, and an authority for levying chauth which had for some time been imposed by the Marāthās in Malwa and Gujarāt. Shāhū's plea was that only if he was given such an authority could he control the chiefs who had already levied contributions there.<sup>40</sup> Secret emissaries from Tara Bai had reached Nizām-ul-Mulk who, we are told, "had formed the secret design of conquering the Deccan, and of setting free that land of treasures and soldiers".<sup>41</sup>

The Saiyids were afraid lest the entire Deccan problem should be opened afresh because of the vaulting ambition of the Satara house, and the intrigues of Nizām-ul-Mulk. Hence, it appears, that they wanted to divide the Empire into zones of authority among themselves so that both the North and the South might receive due attention. A partition of the Empire on these lines had also been suggested as a solution to the growing differences between the two brothers. As a first step towards such a division, the Saiyids wanted to remove Nizām-ul-Mulk from Malwa. Ḥusain 'Alī offered Nizām-ul-Mulk the choice

38 Wārid 315.

39 K.K. 851, 857, 859, Siyar 425, Aḥwāl 172a.

40 Duff i 365-66.

41 K.K. 858. After his rebellion, Nizām-ul-Mulk was joined by a contingent from Tara Bai at Burhanpur. (Āṣaf Jāh, 118).

of the Governorship of Agra, Allahabad, Burhanpur and Multan,<sup>42</sup> assuring him that he would be sent the sanad of whichever ṣūbah he chose.<sup>43</sup> But Nizām-ul-Mulk objected to giving up Malwa so soon after his appointment, particularly in the midst of the harvest season before the advances (taqāvi) and the money spent by him had been recovered. He protested that he had accepted Malwa on the solemn promises of not being removed (soon), and that he looked upon the order of transfer as a breach of promise.<sup>44</sup> As early as November, 1719, Husain 'Alī had deputed a strong force under his Bakhshī, Dilāwar 'Alī Khān, to settle a dispute in Bundi, with instructions to keep a watch on the Malwa border after finishing the job. Dilāwar 'Alī had finished his assignment in Bundi, and at this time, was hovering on the Malwa border. He was now warned to be alert and letters were sent to 'Ālam 'Alī to be vigilant in guarding the Deccan.<sup>45</sup>

42 K.K. 851, 857, 859; Siyar 425. According to Kāmwar, a farmān was sent to Nizām-ul-Mulk promising him that he would be appointed to Agra as soon as he reached the court. Qāsim (195-6) mentions the ṣūbah of Allahabad. Shiv Das (56) simply says that Husain 'Alī transferred Nizām-ul-Mulk from Malwa.

43 K.K. 850. This seems to imply that Nizām-ul-Mulk was given the option of proceeding to his charge without coming to the court first, as was customary in such cases.

44 K.K. (851, 859) treats the transfer as a virtual declaration of war, and says that Husain 'Alī had decided to destroy Nizām-ul-Mulk. This decision he ascribes to Husain 'Alī's overweening conceit and underestimation of his enemies.

On the other hand, Siyar (424-25) holds Nizām-ul-Mulk's ambition responsible for the breach.

T. Muṣṣ. (231-50) and Ḥadīqat (94-100) follow K.K. Aḥwāl (155b) steers a middle course. According to the author, on hearing the news of Nizām-ul-Mulk's preparations in Malwa, the Saiyids, after many consultations, decided to send a farmān of recall by the hands of mace-bearers, while a force was moved across the Chambal. If the governor submitted, all would be well; if not they could still fight or negotiate. If he fled to the south, their generals could pursue. 'Ālam 'Alī at Aurangabad was warned to be on the alert. Thus, "Nizām-ul-Mulk would inevitably be caught between two fires (if he rebelled.)"

This would appear to be the most plausible explanation in the circumstances.

45 Aḥwāl 157a; K.K. 844, 851, 859; Shiv Das 152. Nizām-ul-Mulk complained

Having taken these precautions, the Saiyids despatched a mace-bearer to escort Nizām-ul-Mulk back to the court. This move of the Saiyids did not come as a surprise to Nizām-ul-Mulk, for he had been repeatedly warned by M. Amīn and Dia'nat Khān that the Saiyids intended to move against him after the conclusion of the affair of Girdhar Bahadur (in Allahabad). He had also received special messages from the Emperor and his Mother asking him to liberate them from the grip of the Saiyids.<sup>46</sup> Hence, he decided to disregard the orders to return to the court, and unfurled the banner of revolt. He left Ujjain, ostensibly for the court, but turned south, and crossed the Narmada into the Deccan.<sup>47</sup>

In the Deccan, Nizām-ul-Mulk was immediately joined by the governors of Berar and Khandesh. The strong fort of Asīrgarh yielded to him without a shot being fired. Some of the nobles who now joined him—as far example, Tāhir Khān the governor of Asīrgarh, and Nūrullāh Khān and Anwārullāh Khān of Burhanpur, had been the protégés and the trusted men of the Saiyids.<sup>48</sup>

These desertions reveal the political weakness of the Saiyids, and their profound unpopularity at the time. The Saiyids had confirmed the old nobles and officials in their positions, but many of them considered the new régime disgraceful and the Saiyids as being traitors to the salt. Nizām-ul-Mulk exploited these sentiments. He sedulously preached:

of the presence of the Bakhshī on his borders, and pointed out that it was causing a great deal of loss in life and property to the people of the province, and that these "unseemly blandishments were totally against the promise given by he Saiyids."

<sup>46</sup> K.K. 851.

<sup>47</sup> This was towards the middle of Jamāda II [c. April 24. Irvine (ii 22) is not right in thinking that the news of Nizām-ul-Mulk's rebellion reached the Saiyids about 9 Rajab | May 17 after he had crossed the Narmada. K.K. (856) definitely states that the news of the Nizām-ul-Mulk's rebellion reached Agra by the end of Jamāda II. In a letter to Ajit Singh written about 4 Rajab | May 12, 'Abdullāh K. says, "Nizām-ul-Mulk by this time must have crossed the Narbada." (Bāl. 31).

<sup>48</sup> K.K. 871-3, 867, 852-3; Ḥaḍīqat 99; M.U. iii 877. Others like 'Twaz Khān and Rao Rambhā Nimbālkar also joined Nizām-ul-Mulk.

(i) that whatever he was doing he was doing for the honour and the prestige of the royal house, the Saiyids having decided to subvert the Timurid dynasty;<sup>49</sup>

(ii) that the Saiyids had determined to ruin and disgrace all Irānī and Tūrānī families and that his own destruction was the first step in that direction; and, finally,

(iii) that the Saiyids were allied with Hindus and were pursuing anti-Islamic policies detrimental to the Empire.<sup>50</sup>

These slogans, and particularly the slogan of monarchy in danger became the rallying cry of the anti-Saiyid movement led by Nizām-ul-Mulk.

These developments threw the Saiyids into great fear and perplexity and divided their counsels. The emphasis of Nizām-ul-Mulk on racial and religious issues sharpened the differences between the two brothers on the policy to be pursued towards the old nobility. Husain 'Alī Khān—whom Nizām-ul-Mulk once described as being in character a more soldier who, as soon as he sees any thing unfavourable, burns with anger and at once becomes an enemy—felt that the "Mughal" nobles, and especially the Tūrānīs could no longer be trusted. As a first step, he favoured the assassination of M. Amīn Khān who was the second Bakhshī and the cousin of Nizām-ul-Mulk. 'Abdullah Khān regarded such a course as "ungerous and, at any rate, dishonest and inexpedient". It seems that he wanted to treat Nizām-ul-Mulk's

49 Thus, after the conquest of Burhanpur, Nizām-ul-Mulk is said to have assembled all the prominent men of the town and told them, "The only object of my exertions is to free the Emperor from the tyranny of the selfish people who have placed such strict restraints on his liberty that he cannot even come to the Friday prayers." (Note the emphasis on religion)." "(Ḥadīqat ii 98, K.K. 855). Similarly, in a letter to M. Khān Bangash, Nizām-ul-Mulk declared."

"Bā ḥam-dīgarī hamchān kār-i-man pardāzand ki Ḥazrat Zill-i-subḥānī az dast-i-ẓālimān bar-āwūrand, wa bah istiqlāl-i-tamām ba-akhtiyār-i-khud shawand. (Khuṣṣṣah 322).

50 This aspect is emphasized by almost all the contemporary writers. The alliance of the two brothers with Ajit Singh and Chūrāman Jat, the dominance of Ratan Chand "the vile infidel" in their affairs, the abolition of jizyah is emphasised by all writers as causes of the alienation of the old nobles. In particular, see K.K. 905, Āshūb 150-54.

rebellion as the aberration merely of one individual, and not the symbol and proof of the disaffection of the entire body of the "Mughal" nobility. He even favoured the conciliation of Nizām-ul-Mulk by granting the Deccan to him. He sarcastically remarked that Nizām-ul-Mulk's rebellion was only the first fruit of the deposition of Farrukh Siyar, and accused Ḥusain 'Alī of having precipitated a premature clash with Nizām-ul-Mulk. Khān-i-Daurān and Ratan Chand supported 'Abdullāh Khān's proposal for a compromise, remarking that "war would end in the death of the Saiyids".<sup>51</sup>

At 'Abdullāh Khān's insistence, Ḥusain 'Alī gave up the idea of removing M. Amīn Khān and, as a further gesture to the "Mughals", a Tūrānī nobleman, Ḥaider Qulī Khān, was given the important post of Mīr Ātish. But Ḥusain 'Alī rejected the proposal for compromise as being the counsel of defeat and one which was bound to be rejected by Nizām-ul-Mulk, and would, therefore, weaken their position.<sup>52</sup> He blamed his brother for lack of initiative and courage. Finally, at his instance, Dilāwar 'Alī was ordered to march against Nizām-ul-Mulk from the North, while 'Ālam 'Alī, the deputy of Ḥusain 'Alī in the Deccan, marched from the south so as to crush Nizām-ul-Mulk between their combined forces. Letters were also despatched to Shāhū and to Bālājī Vishwanāth requesting them to assist 'Ālam 'Alī.<sup>53</sup>

However, Nizām-ul-Mulk proved too quick for the Saiyid commanders. He fell upon Dilāwar 'Alī before the latter could be joined by 'Ālam 'Alī, and completely routed him on June 19, 1720. He then 51 K.K. 867. Ḥusain 'Alī had also desired to exile 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān.

52 Ibid. (cf. Elliot's translation, vii 492, where the passage has been given a quite different meaning).

53 Aḥwāl, Bāl. 31. In reply, Shāhū assured 'Abdullāh Khān of his sympathy and support for 'Ālam 'Alī Khān and his lasting friendship for Ḥusain 'Alī. He also promised the help of an army. Already a Marāṭhā army was approaching Hyderabad after campaigning in the Karnātak. 'Abdullāh Khān showed his gratitude by the despatch of the sanads of Deshmukhi requested by Bālājī Vishwanāth. This must have been in confirmation of the previous grant, since the original grants were taken by Bālājī with him when returning from Delhi. (Bāl. 14, 15).

turned round to face 'Ālam 'Alī who had meanwhile been joined by a strong body of Marāthā horsemen under Peshwa Baji Rao.<sup>54</sup>

This unexpected blow threw the Saiyids into the utmost consternation. 'Abdullāh Khān once again urged a compromise with Nizām-ul-Mulk in order to gain a breathing spell. Some of the well-wishers of the Saiyids, like Dia'nat Khān Khwāfī, the Dīwān-i-Tan wa Khālīṣah, pointed out that Ḥusain 'Alī's family was still in the Deccan, and that in order to prevent its falling into the hands of Nizām-ul-Mulk a cautious policy was necessary. M. Amīn Khān, the cousin of Nizām-ul-Mulk, was secretly delighted with the turn of affairs, but offered to help in bringing about in accomodation with his Nizām-ul-Mulk.<sup>55</sup>

In the end, a double faced policy was decided upon. Farmāns and letters couched in hypocritical language were sent to Nizām-ul-Mulk, granting him the Viceroyalty of the Deccan and condemning and repudiating Dilāwar 'Alī Khān's action. Nizām-ul-Mulk was asked to permit 'Ālam 'Alī and the Mīr Bakhshī's family to leave the Deccan.<sup>56</sup> At the same time, preparations were pushed ahead for leading a grand army to the Deccan, and 'Ālam 'Alī was instructed to await its arrival.<sup>57</sup>

But Nizām-ul-Mulk was too shrewd to be taken in by such an apparent manoeuvre. He turned the tables upon his rivals by making use of their farmān in a way they had not foreseen. He gave it the widest possible publicity, thus making himself the legally constituted viceroy of the Deccan in the eyes of all and sundry, and making 'Ālam 'Alī a rebel who was defying Imperial authority by refusing to hand over charge to him. 'Ālam 'Alī not only lost moral authority, but many waverers now threw in their lot with Nizām-ul-Mulk.<sup>58</sup>

54 In fulfilment of Shāhū's promise, Baji Rao joined 'Ālam 'Alī with 15-16000 horsemen (S.P.D. X 5, XXX, 265, K.K. 874, Ḥadīqat ii 101.)

55 M.U. i 333, Irvine ii 34-5.

56 Shiv Das 83-5-copies of letter and farmān (full text in Irvine ii 35-6).

57 Bāl. 25, 12, 11; Iqbāl 88, K.K. 886. The letter to 'Ālam 'Alī is d. 27 Rajab|4 June 1720.

58 Shiv Das 93, Qāsim. cf. English factors who again reproduce bazar rumours: "as expected he (Nizām-ul-Mulk) refused the Phirmaund and seerpao sent him by the King—returning reply that it come from the Syed who kept the

It is not necessary for our purposes to treat in detail the subsequent story of the defeat and downfall of the Saiyids. Suffice it to say that 'Ālam 'Alī and his Marāthā confederates were completely routed by Nizām-ul-Mulk in a battle at Shakar Khera on 10th August, 1720.<sup>59</sup> Soon after this, Ḥusain 'Alī was assassinated while on his way to the Deccan with the Emperor. This was the out-come of a plot hatched by M. Amīn Khān, the second Bakhshī, Ḥaider Qulī Khān, the Mīr Ātish, and some others like Sa'adat Khān (later Burhān-ul-Mulk) and Mīr Jumlah.<sup>60</sup> 'Abdullāh Khān was then on his way to Delhi. When he heard the news, he pushed on to the capital, and raised a new puppet to the throne under the name of Ibrāhīm Khān, and attempted to rally his supporters. The Bārahās<sup>61</sup> stood by him to the end, as also Chūrāman Jat. Many Afghans, too, joined, perhaps out of a mercenary motive, though M. Khān Bangash, the only prominent King Prisoner from whom he hoped to deliver him". (Bengal Consultations, Range i Vol iv 139).

59 According to K.K. (886, 899), 'Ālam 'Alī had been advised by the Marāthās to wait behind the walls of Aurangābād for the arrival of Ḥusain 'Alī, and in the meantime, to let them carry on guerilla warfare. But in his pride, 'Ālam 'Alī rejected the advice. Nizām-ul-Mulk, it is said, had offered him safe conduct to the North, which too he refused. (Iqbāl 92).

60 K.K. 902-5, Wārid 317-8, Qāsim 135-6, Shākir 20-1, Harcharan 30-1, Shiv Das 101-2, T. Muṣ. 271-3, Irvine ii 56-61. Two despatches from the court to Jai Singh give the details of the assassination (J.R., Add. Pers. Vol. ii, Nos. 193, 198.)

61 On the eve of the battle of Ḥasanpur, 'Abdullāh Khān was joined by 10—12,000 sawārs (Bārahās and Afghans), and by 150 carts full of Bārahās "who rallied to the cause of their clansman at the behest of Saif-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān who had been sent by Ḥusain 'Alī to recruit troops in Bārahā." (K.K. 918).

Many of the soldiers of Ḥusain 'Alī who under compulsion had joined Muḥammad Shāh after Ḥusain 'Alī's assassination, deserted to 'Abdullāh Khān in groups of 2-300 on the eve of the battle. (K.K. 918). Likewise, Raja Mukham Singh and many other private employees of the Saiyids who had been forced to join Muḥammad Shāh also deserted to 'Abdullāh Khān. (K.K. 920, 925).

The only prominent Bārahā who went against the Saiyids was Saiyid Nuṣrat Khān Bārahā who had a personal grudge against 'Abdullāh Khān and was a particular friend of Khān-i-Daurān. (Siyar 436-37, T. Muṣ. 273).

Afghan noble at the time, went over to the side of M. Amīn Khān and the Emperor Muḥammad Shāh. Some old nobles of Farrukh Siyar living in retirement at Delhi, such as Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Aḥmad Beg, M. Murād Kāshmīrī, etc. also agreed to join 'Abdullāh Khān. Khāfi Khān says that "any butcher, cook or cotton-carder who presented himself, mounted on some wretched pony was employed, and given Rs. 80/- per month."<sup>62</sup> But the hastily collected army of 'Abdullāh Khān could not stand against the armies of M. Amīn Khān, Muḥammad Khān Bangash, and the Emperor Muḥammad Shāh. On November 13, 1720, 'Abdullāh Khān was defeated at Ḥasanpur near Agra and taken prisoner.

Thus ended the "new" wizārat of the Saiyid brothers.

* * *

The inability of the Saiyids to consolidate their power may be ascribed largely to the opposition offered by an important section of the old nobles belonging to the time of Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh. This section looked upon the Saiyids as upstarts, and was not prepared to be over-shadowed by them in conducting the affairs of the empire. The general policy and approach of the Saiyid brothers to the various political problems facing the empire was also not to its liking.

The leading role in the opposition to the Saiyids was played by a small but powerful group centring round Nizām-ul-Mulk and M. Amīn Khān. These capable and ambitious nobles aspired to exercise supreme power in the state. They also disliked the Saiyid policy of making large concessions to the Rājapūts, Marāthās etc., and to the Hindu opinion generally, regarding it as being a departure from the policies of Aurangzīb, contrary to the Islamic character of the state and against the best interests of the empire and the monarchy.

Apart from posing as the defenders of Islam and the monarchy, the opponents of the Saiyids appealed to the narrow interests of a section of the nobility by depicting the Saiyids as anti-Mughal, and by accusing them of seeking to monopolise power for themselves and their creatures. However, neither the policy and the practice of the Saiyids, nor an analysis of the actual party groupings support such an interpretation. The Saiyids attempted, as we have seen above, to associate in the higher ranks of the nobility all sections including the various ethnic groups at the court, the nobles belonging to the time of Aurangzīb and Bahādur Shāh, and the Rājputs, Marāthās, etc.<sup>63</sup> But it suited their opponents to misrepresent the policy of the Saiyids, and to give to the anti-Saiyid struggle the outer character of a struggle between the Mughals and the Hindustanis.

<sup>62</sup> K.K. 915-6, 897-8, 918.

Politically, the biggest error of the Saiyids was the deposition of Farrukh Siyar. The question has been argued on a moral plane—whether “the Saiyids were disloyal to their king”, or whether they “treated him as the case required”.<sup>64</sup> Irvine has opined that the deposition of Farrukh Siyar was, perhaps, unavoidable “but the way of doing what had become almost a necessity was unduly harsh and the taking of the captive’s life was an extremity entirely uncalled for”.<sup>65</sup>

This really is to beg the question. The execution of Farrukh Siyar, though performed with unnecessary cruelty, was a logically unavoidable corollary of his deposition. As long as he was alive, the Saiyids could not feel secure. What the Saiyids had to decide was whether they could realize their objectives without deposing Farrukh Siyar. ‘Abdullāh Khān was apparently of the opinion that they could. He felt that there was no harm in leaving the sikkah and the khutbah in Farrukh Siyar’s name as long as all the important offices remained in their control, and were filled by their nominees. The deposition, for which Ḥusain ‘Alī seems to bear the primary responsibility, created apprehensions in the minds of many nobles about the ultimate intentions of the Saiyids, and alienated their own supporters who were not prepared for such extreme measures.<sup>66</sup> From being looked upon as brave individuals 63 Cf. Owen, “Fall of the Moghul Empire”, 149, 163. The author considers that an important cause of the downfall of the Saiyids was the numerical weakness of the Bārāhā community. Since the Saiyids never attempted to base their power on any one community, the explanation is hardly sufficient.

64 M.U. i 344.

65 Irvine i 395.

66 Cf. Jauhar 50. We are told that even men who owed their fortunes to [continued] who were fighting an ungrateful master for the preservation of their life and honour, after the deposition the Saiyids began to be considered tyrants and traitors to the salt who had brought infamy to their family. All contemporary writers, including those favourable to the Saiyids are agreed in condemning the deposition as an act of infamy and disgrace.<sup>67</sup> Considering the weakness of their actual position, it was a political blunder, for it enabled their rivals, the 'Chīn' group, to appear as the champions of the Timurid monarchy and to utilise the public revulsion against the Saiyids for their own ends.<sup>68</sup>

Secondly, the Saiyids over-estimated their strength and resources, disagreed among themselves about the policy to be pursued towards the powerful 'Chīn' group, and ultimately precipitated a premature show-down with it. It would appear that 'Abdullāh Khān understood better than Ḥusain 'Alī the real weakness of their position. By patient and careful diplomacy, he had succeeded in detaching M. Amīn Khān, Nizām-ul-Mulk and Sarbuland Khān from Farrukh Siyar. He was keen that the understanding with these nobles should be maintained and, if possible, strengthened. Hence, he favoured a caution and conciliatory policy towards them. On the other hand, Ḥusain 'Alī who was inclined to be haughty and over-bearing, apparently held the view that such a policy was unworkable. He desired that Nizām-ul-Mulk, M. Amīn Khān, etc. should be destroyed at the earliest possible moment, or at any rate, rendered incapable of any mischief. This divergence of outlook and approach accentuated the differences which had already the Saiyids used to pray secretly for their downfall (Qāsim 151).

When Nizām-ul-Mulk reached the Deccan, many nobles who owed their positions to the Saiyids, including the commandants of some important forts, deserted the Saiyids, and joined him. (See 157 above).

- 67 Thus, K.K. (901) calls the downfall of the Saiyids a heavenly retribution for their faithlessness to their master. Qāsim (Sarkar Ms. 158) who is generally favourable to the Saiyids, refers to the deposition as an act of disloyalty (namākḥarāmā). So, too, Siyar. Kāmwar strongly denounces it, as also Ḥadiqat (89), Jauhar (48a), Khush-ḥāl (416) and Wārid (309).
- 68 Thus, Ajit Singh was pelted with stones in the streets of Delhi for his part in the deposition and subsequent execution of Farrukh Siyar. Even the beggars refused the charity of the Saiyids for some time. (K.K. 900, Qāsim 151).

appeared between the two brothers over the division of power and the spoils of victory.

The Saiyids did not enjoy supreme power long enough for a proper estimate being made of their administrative capabilities. The spirit of party strife which kept growing from the accession of Farrukh Siyar paralysed the administration, and "everywhere zamindars and malcontents raised their head." Established rules of business were ignored.<sup>69</sup> The dependence of the Saiyids on subordinates like Ratan Chand made them unpopular, and reflected unfavourably on their administrative competence. The responsibility for bribe-taking and harshness in revenue-farming is ascribed to these subordinates.<sup>70</sup> On the other hand, it is not denied even by those writers who are strongly opposed to the Saiyids that they strove hard to maintain law and order, and that their military reputation and capabilities prevented a final break-down of the administration.<sup>71</sup>

By concentrating power in their hands, the Saiyids sought to save the Mughal empire from the process of disintegration which had inevitably followed the accession of a weak or incompetent king. Simultaneously, they pursued policies which, if persisted in for some time, might have led to the development of a composite ruling class consisting of all sections in the Mughal nobility as well as the Rajputs

69 M.U. i 309, Āshūb 152, 136.

70 K.K. 941-43. The author relates how 'Abdullāh Khān returned the escheated property of 'Abdul Ghafūr Bohra without accepting anything for himself. In the case of the Surman Embassy also, he did not accept "a farthing".

71 Rustam 'Alī says "As is well known, this Emperor (Muḥammad Shāh) so long as Amīru-l-Umawā Husain 'Alī Khān lived, strictly observed, by virtue of the efficient management of that great Saiyid, all the ancient laws and established rules of his ancestors. The achievement of all undertakings, the arrangement of all political affairs, and the execution of all wars were carried on in an excellent manner by the wisdom of that high nobleman". (T. Hindī, Elliot viii 42, 43).

The Saiyids were worried by self-seekers (Shiv Das 136). Even K.K. (942) admits that "the inhabitants of those countries which were innocent of contumacy or selfishness made no complaint of the rule of the Saiyids". Iqbāl (128) says that unemployment was rare in the time of the Saiyids, and any soldier or person who reached their audience, generally secured a job worth Rs. 50/- p.m. at the lowest.

and the Marāthās. In the ultimate analysis, the political structure which had been evolved by the Mughals could be consolidated and developed only by the further growth of such a ruling class in the country. The major obstacle in this process was that apart from the Saiyids there were no powerful groups or sections at the court or outside it which were actively interested in such a development. The 'Ālamgīrī nobles, or the section often described as the "Mughals" were generally averse to sharing power with anyone, deeming only themselves fit for the task of governing the empire. Most of the Marāthā sardars were mainly concerned with establishing a domination over the Deccan, and were not interested in the maintenance of the Mughal empire. Although Shāhū's interests coincided with those of the Saiyids for the time being, he had little desire to see the Mughal empire revived and strengthened, and felt little sympathy with the Saiyid desire to evolve a composite ruling class. However, the Saiyids failed to utilise the Marāthās even to the limited extent possible. 'Ālam Alī, Husain 'Alī's deputy in the Deccan, rejected the advice of Baji Rao to let the Marāthās carry on a harassing warfare against Nizām-ul-Mulk, and to avoid a pitched battle till reinforcement should arrive from Northern India.

The Rajputs had a larger interest than the Marāthās in the maintenance of the Mughal empire, having secured many opportunities of advancement and gain in the service of the empire. They might have been expected to give full support to the Saiyids whose policies were in consonance with their own desires. Ajit Singh and Jai Singh were also beholden to the Saiyids for many favours. However, neither of these Rajas made any effort to render military aid to the Saiyids in their hour of need, preferring to engross themselves in their local ambitions.

Thus, the Saiyids were brought face to face with the old dilemma that the forces of integration were woefully weak in Medieval society, and only a strong central government could keep them in check. In the absence of a competent monarch, a strong central government could have been established by a wazīr if he enjoyed either the support of a powerful section of the nobility, or the backing of a well-established monarchy. The former the Saiyids could not secure, for reasons already indicated. The Saiyids were keen to preserve the Tirmurid monarchy as a symbol of unity. But the traditional suspicion between the monarch and an all-powerful wazīr vitiated the atmosphere, and made co-operation between the two extremely difficult to achieve. Personal factors further aggravated the differences.

Although the Saiyid experiment lacked the elements of permanence for the reasons described above, the "new" wizārat which they sought to establish is not without significance. The Saiyids made a definite break with narrow, exclusionist policies, and moved in the direction of establishing a state essentially secular in approach and national in character. Their downfall did not imply the automatic negation of this process which they had stimulated and strengthened: it continued to work apace and influenced the political and cultural developments of the succeeding period.

CHAPTER VII

NIZĀM-UL-MULK AND THE END OF THE STRUGGLE FOR WIZĀRAT

i The Wizārat of M. Amīn Khān

A year and three months elapsed between the defeat and downfall of the Saiyids, and the assumption of the wizārat by Nizām-ul-Mulk. In the first three months of this period, M. Amīn Khān Chīn, the cousin of Nizām-ul-Mulk, was the wazīr. M. Amīn Khān was granted the rank of 8000/8000 dū aspah sih aspah, along with the absentee governorship of Multan. His son, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, was appointed the second Bakhshī with the rank of 7000, and also obtained the faujdārī of Moradabad, and the posts of the Dāroghah-i-Aḥadī and the Dāroghah-i-Ghusalkhānah both of which were important posts since they implied control over access to the Emperor. Other persons who had taken a leading part in the conspiracy against the Saiyids were also rewarded. Sa'adat Khān was made the Governor of Awadh, and Ḥaider Qulī the Governor of Gujarāt in addition to being appointed the Mīr Ātish. Mīr Jumlah remained the Ṣadr, and Khān-i-Daurān the Chief Bakhshī. Nizām-ul-Mulk retained charge of the Deccan and of Malwa. 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān retained Lahore, with the addition of Kashmir in the name of his son, Zakariyah Khān. Not many changes were made in the other sūbahs.<sup>1</sup>

From the very begining, the new wazīr showed little inclination to fulfill the chief professed aim of the anti-Saiyid movement viz., "the restoration of the Emperor to the full enjoyment of his powers". He was, if anything, more domineering than the Saiyids, and we are told that the share of Muḥammad Shāh was only to sit on the throne and to wear the crown.<sup>2</sup> The Emperor felt afraid of the wazīr and had given him all authority, "paying no heed to the complaints of the people".

1 K.K. 911, 938, Shiv Das 133, Kāmwar 444.

2 Wārid (Hyderabad Ms.) 339, K.K. 940.

The other nobles felt that the Emperor was powerless, and they, too, were afraid of the wazīr.<sup>3</sup> All that the Emperor gained from the overthrow of the Saiyids was a certain measure of personal liberty, but in the affairs of state he had no authority.

Nor could M. Amīn make any sharp break with the general policy of the Saiyids. He made a proposal for the revival of jizyah but due to the opposition of Jai Singh and Girdhar Bahādur, had to abandon the attempt. However, to save the prestige of the wazīr, and to conciliate the orthodox elements, it was declared that the tax had (only) been deferred until "the recovery of the prosperity of the raiyat and the settlement of the country".<sup>4</sup>

In the case of the Marāthās, the agreement made by the Saiyids for the payment of chauth and sardeshmukhi was confirmed by the grant of fresh sanads.<sup>5</sup> Nizām-ul-Mulk, on his part, had already agreed to Shāhū's demand for chauth and sardeshmukhi, and strengthened the agreement by a secret meeting with Peshwa Baji Rao on 4th January, 1721—the first of a series of meetings between these two remarkable men.<sup>6</sup>

Thus, the victory of M. Amīn Khān, Nizām-ul-Mulk etc. did not lead to any immediate changes in the policies initiated by the Saiyids—despite their denunciation of the Saiyids for adopting allegedly "pro-Hindu" policies. Ajit Singh had always been a staunch supporter of the Saiyids. He was removed from Gujarāt for "maladministration",

<sup>3</sup> Iqbāl 130.

<sup>4</sup> Iqbāl 131, K.K. 936, Kāmwar (entry d. Dec. 24, 1720). Shiv Das gives copies of the 'arẓī' submitted by Jai Singh and Girdhar Bahādur (Patna Ms., 339-40). Iqbāl further says, "out of regard for the shara', Jai Singh presented most of the maḥāls of his jāgīrs and zamindari in lieu of jizyah". For a further discussion see the present writer's paper "Jizyah in the post-Aurangzeb Period", I.H. Congress, 1946, 320-27.

<sup>5</sup> Duff i 473, T. Muḡ 307, Riyasat 160.

<sup>6</sup> S.P.D. XXX 266, and apparently the meeting referred to in X 5. No details are available. Nizām-ul-Mulk had already promised Shāhū that he would abide by the grants of Husain 'Alī, and on Dec. 3, 1720, issued a sanad under his own signature confirming the grants in question. He also ordered a number of thanas claimed by Shāhū to be handed over to him (see also Dr. Powar's article in I.H.R.C. XVII, 209-10).

but even in his case M. Amīn was half inclined to restore the province to him.<sup>7</sup>

ii Arrival of Nizām-ul-Mulk and his Early Difficulties.

M. Amīn Khān died after a short illness on January 27, 1721. After some discussion, the Emperor sent a summon to Nizām-ul-Mulk in the Deccan to come and assume the wizārat. Nizām-ul-Mulk had aspired to that office after the downfall of the Saiyids and had actually started for northern India when news arrived of the appointment of M. Amīn Khān as the wazīr. Not wishing to enter into a contest with his cousin, he had cancelled his visit, and left for the Karnātak which was being raided by the Marāthās.<sup>8</sup>

When the royal summons reached Nizām-ul-Mulk, he took some time to settle the affairs in the Karnātak, and so did not reach the court till February 20, 1722. In the interval, Muḥammad Shāh had full opportunity to show his aptitude for government. But he proved himself to be a weak-minded and frivolous person, negligent of the affairs of state and completely under the influence of his favourites. He was never long of the same mind, being, as a Marāthā wakīl observed, "fickle by nature".<sup>9</sup>

Chief among the favourites who came to the forefront during this period were Ḥaider Qulī Khān and Kūkī Jiū. Ḥaider Qulī Khān (Muḥammad Razā) was a native of Iṣfrāin, and had been a follower of 'Azīm-ush-Shān. When Farrukh Siyar came to the throne, he received

7 Mir'āt i 37. Muhar 'Alī Khān, the nā'ib of Ḥaider Qulī, was afraid that Ajit might be restored. He came from Khambayat with an army and ousted Nāhar Khān, the nā'ib of Ajit Singh, and his dwān Anūp Singh. Ajit was not officially dismissed from Gujarāt till Rajab 1133|May, 1721, i.e. till after the death of M. Amīn Khān.

8 In a letter to Sa'd-ud-Dīn Khān, the Khān-i-Sāmān, Nizām-ul-Mulk wrote, "In view of the agreement arrived at between ourselves and 'Itimād-ud-Daulah (M. Amīn Khān), the latter would have done well not to claim the wizārat. This being left behind was odious to us, but in view of our relationship with 'Itimād-ud-Daulah, we controlled our feelings and tolerated this." (Quoted in Āṣaf Jāh, 139-40).

9 S.P.D. XIV 47. Rustam 'Alī calls him, "the asylum of negligence." (T Hindī, 535).

the title of Ḥaider Qulī through Mīr Jumlah and was made the dīwān of the Deccan, with the superintendentship of all the crown-lands, numerous other perquisites, and the power to appoint and remove all subordinates. Nizām-ul-Mulk did not get on with him and sent him back to Delhi on his own authority. He was then made the dīwān of Gujarāt and the muṭsaddī of Surat, in which office he amassed a vast fortune. ‘Abdullāh Khān did not like him and removed him from his office in 1718 upon the complaint of ‘Abdul Ḥaī, the son of ‘Abdul Ghafūr Bohrā whose property, amounting to 85 lakhs of rupees in cash and kind, had been confiscated by Ḥaider Qulī on the false pretext that he had died childless.<sup>10</sup> Arrived at the court, Ḥaider Qulī somehow won the favour of Ratan Chand, and was appointed to the army sent against Agra and Allahabad. Soon afterwards, he was made the Mīr Ātish. This gave Ḥaider Qulī the opportunity to plot against the Saiyids, and for his part in the assassination of Ḥusain ‘Alī he was raised to the rank of 6000/6000. He rose in the favour of the Emperor every day, and by the time Nizām-ul-Mulk arrived to assume the wizārat, he had risen to the rank of 8000/7000.<sup>10a</sup>

Kūkī Jiū is described as a woman of great charm and intelligence, and a friend of the Emperor’s mother. In collusion with Khwājah Khidmatgār, who was said to be one of the Emperor’s close companions, she realised large sums by way of peshkash from applicants for jobs. It is said that the Emperor himself took a share in this illegal income. Kūkī had become so influential that it was popularly rumoured that she kept the royal seal in her charge.<sup>11</sup>

The interference of the royal favourites in administration, and the sleepless jealousy of the chief Bakhshī, Khān-i-Daurān Ṣamsām-ud-Daulah, created great difficulties for the new wazīr. He found that the established rules of business had been thrown to the winds, the old nobility was neglected, income was declining, and the Empire was fast sinking into its grave.

10 Mirāt ii 4-5, M.U. iii 746. ‘Abdul Ghafūr was reputed to be one of the richest merchants of the world at that time. It is a tribute to the character of ‘Abdullāh Khān that he returned the property of ‘Abdul Ghafūr to his son without accepting even a pice for himself.

10a K.K. 940, Wārid 43, M.U. iii 746.

11 Shiv Das 154, Wārid 43, K.K. 940.

When Nizām-ul-Mulk complained of Ḥaider Qulī's interference in the administration, the Emperor ordered Ḥaider Qulī to proceed to his governorship of Gujarāt. Arrived in Gujarāt, Ḥaider Qulī adopted a haughty and over-bearing attitude, and began to assume the airs of an independent prince. He usurped the jāgīrs assigned to Imperial nobles; employed 'Arabs, Ḥabshīs and Franks (Europeans) to strengthen his artillery department; escheated goods without obtaining permission; and infringed royal privileges by hearing complaints while seated on a raised platform, witnessing animal fights, awarding fringed pālkīs to his followers, etc. etc. It was alleged that he dared to do all this because he enjoyed the secret support of the Emperor.<sup>12</sup>

At length, Nizām-ul-Mulk, who had been removed from the governorship of Malwa a short time back, persuaded the Emperor to grant him the ṣūbah of Gujarāt in the name of his son, Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān, and set out for Gujarāt in December, 1722, on the plea of curbing the pretensions of Ḥaider Qulī.<sup>13</sup> His real motives, however, would seem to be different. He had come to Delhi with mixed motives—partly because he fondly believed that he could set the affairs of the Empire right, and partly to see what he had to hope and fear from the new Emperor. The first of these hopes seemed likely to prove illusory, or, at any rate, to be a far more difficult task than he had apparently imagined. Meanwhile, his position in the Deccan was being jeopardized. Mubārīz-ul-Mulk, whom he had appointed his deputy in the Deccan in his absence, had repudiated the pact with Shāhū for chauth and sardeshmukhi, and this had led to a recrudescence of trouble with the Marāthās.<sup>14</sup> In 1723, Peshwa Baji Rao entered Malwa at the head of a large army in order to lead what was to be the first of a series of extending Marāthā operations into that strategic province.

Nizām-ul-Mulk met Baji Rao on February 24, 1723, at Badākshā (or Bolāshā) near Jhābua in Malwa, and remained with him for a week (till March 2).<sup>15</sup> We have no information regarding the nature of the 12 Wārid 7-8, Mirāt ii 45-7, K.K. 940, 946, Shiv Das 143, Shākir 16.

13 K.K. 947. Girdhar Bahādur had succeeded Nizām-ul-Mulk in September 1722 (Kāmwar).

14 K.K. 962-3, Ḥadīqat 136, Riyasat 163.

15 S.P.D. xxx, No. 310, xxii 4, K.K. 946, Rajwade ii 48.

discussions and the conclusions arrived at, and can only make guesses and draw inferences. The meeting was followed by a joint campaign against Dost Muḥammad Khān, the Nawab of Bhopal. Shortly afterwards, Nizām-ul-Mulk assumed charge of the ṣūbah of Malwa, and Baji Rao returned to the Deccan.

From the above, we may conclude that the trend of the talks was friendly, and resulted in some kind of an accord. On the side of Nizām-ul-Mulk, there was every reason for him to be friendly to the Peshwa. He had not yet made up his mind whether to make a bid for power at Delhi, or to return to the Deccan. Meanwhile, it was no use creating enemies. On Baji Rao's side, too, the motives for friendship with Nizām-ul-Mulk were equally strong. Nizām-ul-Mulk was the Imperial wazīr. He was also one of the most powerful nobles in the empire, and the master of the Deccan. He had till then, given no cause for hostility to the Marāthās, having accepted Shāhū's claim for chauth and sardeshmukhi. The young Peshwa was, therefore, keen to secure the friendship of such a powerful person.

It was typical of the diplomacy of Nizām-ul-Mulk, however, that while attempting to utilise the Peshwa's friendship, he was careful to seek safe-guards against an over expansion of the latter's power. His assumption of the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa—for which permission from the Emperor was apparently obtained later,<sup>17</sup> was aimed at containing the Marāthās in the south and preventing their northward expansion.

Thus, already we see Nizām-ul-Mulk formulating the policy on which he was to act throughout his life, i.e. maintaining his supremacy in the Deccan and keeping a line open to Delhi, and of seeking to circumscribe the power of the Marāthās without affecting an irreparable breach with them.

After the meeting, Nizām-ul-Mulk resumed his march towards Gujarāt. Haider Qulī, who had failed to find support in any quarter, was seized with panic. Feigning madness, he left for Delhi with a very few followers. On hearing this, Nizām-ul-Mulk appointed his cousin, 16 S.P.D. xxx 267, xxii 4: Vad ii 144, and T. Faṭḥiyah (as quoted in Aṣaf Jāh, loc. cit.). The author was actually present at the siege. The Nizām was very boastful, but failed to take Islāmnagar after a long siege.

17 Kāmwar simply says that at Sironj, on May 25, 1723, Nizām-ul-Mulk appointed 'Azīmullāh Khān as the deputy governor of Malwa. K.K. is silent.

Hāmid Khān, his deputy in Gujarāt, and from Jhalor turned back towards Delhi.<sup>18</sup>

Thus, Gujarāt, also passed under Nizām-ul-Mulk's control.

iii Nizām-ul-Mulk's Scheme of Reforms, and his Departure for the Deccan.

On July 3, 1723, Nizām-ul-Mulk returned to the court. He found that under the influence of Kūkī, corruption and bribery had increased. The courtiers and imperial favourites had seized the most profitable and easily manageable jāgīrs. Even the khālīṣah land had been distributed in assignments. Revenue-farming (ijārah) which led to high prices on the one hand, and rank-renting resulting in the impoverishment of the peasantry and steadily declining revenue on the other, had become fully prevalent. Bribe-taking flourished from top to bottom under the guise of presents or peshkash. The result was that the old nobles spent their time in poverty and unemployment, and the imperial treasury had not the money to pay the soldiers and the manṣabdārs on cash salaries. The small manṣabdārs were the hardest hit. They lacked the wherewithals to maintain themselves and their contingents, and many of them took to trade.<sup>19</sup>

In order to restore the efficiency of the administration, and to repair the finances of the Empire, Nizām-ul-Mulk drew up a detailed report and placed it before the Emperor. His main demands—which he had apparently been pressing upon the Emperor since his arrival at the Court, were as follows: that only fit nobles and soldiers should be employed, as in the time of Aurangzīb; that the farming of khālīṣah lands should be discontinued; that the jāgīrs should be re-distributed and khālīṣah lands (given in jāgīrs) resumed; that bribe-taking must stop, and lastly, that the jizyah should be levied as in the time of Aurangzīb.<sup>20</sup>

18 K.K. 946, Mirāt ii 48.

19 K.K. 947, Wārid (A.U.L. Ms.), 8-9, Siyar 458.

20 Ibid. K.K. says that Nizām-ul-Mulk also proposed an expedition to restore the Ṣafwid monarch who had been recently expelled from Iṣfahān by M. Husain Afghan. Irvine (ii 132) rightly says that such a proposal accords ill with the cautious character of Nizām. Probably there was some vague talk of such an expedition. Iṣfahān fell on October 21, 1722. The news reached Delhi on March 10, 1723. Nizām-ul-Mulk left for Gujarāt

These proposals were not at all to the liking of the Emperor, while the favourites were afraid that if Nizām-ul-Mulk was once allowed to establish himself at the court, they would lose all their influence. The favourites also stood to lose the most from the proposed reforms. Hence, they represented to the Emperor that the circumstances of the Empire were different from those in the time of Aurangzīb, and that an attempt to restore the old rules would merely disturb the revenue and the administrative system. They sought to sow suspicion of Nizām-ul-Mulk's intentions in the mind of the Emperor by dwelling upon his ambitiousness and love of power, and by harping upon the danger that a successful general like him would present to the dynasty.<sup>21</sup> They seized upon the proposal to revive the jizyah and represented to the Emperor, singly and in groups, that the tax was "inopportune", and that "the only purpose of Nizām-ul-Mulk's proposals was to create confusion in the administration and to sow discord and hate between the state and its servants." The contemporary writer, Wārid, laments that "the nobles had become lax in matters of faith and religion", and ascribes their opposition to the revival of jizyah to "the instigation of the Hindus." However, the favourites were opposed to Nizām-ul-Mulk for reasons of their own. The latter's insistence on the reimposition of jizyah enabled them to secure the sympathy and support of the Hindu nobles and officials also, and to isolate Nizām-ul-Mulk. Even 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān, who was related to Nizām-ul-Mulk by marriage, opposed the re-imposition of jizyah.<sup>22</sup>

The result was that the Emperor gave his formal assent to the proposals of Nizām-ul-Mulk but shelved them in reality. The virtual rejection of his scheme of reforms placed Nizām-ul-Mulk in a difficult situation. He could imitate the Saiyid by resorting to a coup de main, disperse his enemies, and reduce Muḥammad Shāh to the position of a puppet, or even set up a new Emperor. Nizām-ul-Mulk probably had the power to do so—indeed, he was in a more favourable position than the Saiyids to consolidate his power after a coup. But Nizām-ul-Mulk in December 1722 and returned in July 1723. His position at the court was already precarious and it is doubtful if he could have seriously made a proposal of this nature.

21 Wārid 643; Shiv Das 150, 153; K.K. 940.

22 Wārid 40 (O.P.L. Ms.), K.K. 949.

seems to have considered such a course dishonourable as well as futile. The nobility was far too heterogeneous and internal jealousies among them too strong to permit any individual, however capable he might be, to exercise supreme power on their behalf. The only alternative was to set up a new dynasty which, in the circumstances, was unthinkable. On the other hand, to remain at the court as a helpless onlooker went against the grain, and would also jeopardize Nizām-ul-Mulk's position in the Deccan. The royal favourites were not slow to point out that Nizām-ul-Mulk's retention of the Viceroyalty of the Deccan in addition to his being the (absentee) governor of Gujarāt and Malwa, and the wazīr endangered the monarchy. There was no precedent in Mughal history of the concentration of so much power in the hands of one noble. Hence, moves were set afoot to deprive Nizām-ul-Mulk of the Deccan.

Nizām-ul-Mulk had always looked upon the Deccan as the land of his dreams. He had spent most of his youth there, and since the dispossession of the Saiyids, he considered it his own by right of the sword. He was not at all willing to relinquish it in favour of a precarious wizārat at the court. News of the renewed activity of the Marāthās in the Deccan, and his own distrust of his deputy, Mubārīz-ul-Mulk whom he had tried to remove from the Deccan by suggesting his name for the vacant governorship of Kabul, convinced Nizām-ul-Mulk that he must return to the Deccan if he was to retain possession of it.<sup>23</sup> The visit to Delhi had been essentially in the nature of an exploratory visit. Having personally witnessed the utter imbecility of the court and the Emperor's complete want of a will of his own, he determined to go his own way, conscious that there was little harm that the Court could do him, and convinced of the futility of wasting his energies in efforts to reform the court, and in setting right the affairs of the Empire.

For sometime after the rejection of his proposed reforms by the Emperor, Nizām-ul-Mulk kept up a show of negotiations. But it was obvious that he had already made up his mind to return to the Deccan. With the death in December 1723 of Raja Gūjar Mal, the Dīwān-i-Khālīṣah, who had been carrying on negotiations with the Emperor on behalf of Nizām-ul-Mulk, the last hope of a compromise disappeared.<sup>24</sup>

23 M.U. iii 735-6.

24 K.K. 949, Kāmwar 267.

In December 1723, Nizām-ul-Mulk marched to his jagīr in Moradabad for "a change of air". From Agra he sent a report that the Marāthās had invaded Malwa and Gujarāt which were under his son's charge, and that he must march south to expel them. As Nizām-ul-Mulk approached Malwa, the Marāthās re-crossed the Narmada. Just then, news reached Nizām that he had been superseded in the viceroyalty of the Deccan by his deputy, Mubārīz Khān, and that attempts were being made through Jai Singh to enlist the support of Kanhoji and other Marāthā sardars against him.<sup>25</sup> The Emperor had also opened negotiations with Shāhū.<sup>26</sup> Nizām-ul-Mulk now threw off all pretense, and marched south to assert his claims.

On October 11, 1724, with the aid of Baji Rao, Nizām-ul-Mulk defeated Mubārīz Khān at Shakar Khērā near Aurangābād.<sup>27</sup> From this battle may be dated the independent principality of Haiderābād. The break-up of the Mughal Empire had begun.

iv Jat and Rājput Affairs.

The gradual rise of a Jat power on the borders of Rājputānā and the Agra shūbah, and a revival of the power and importance of the Rājput princes had been two notable features of the preceedings years. The alliance of the Saiyids with these sections had served to emphasise this process, and to give greater confidence to the Jats and Rājputs.

After the down-fall of the Saiyids, the question of the relationship of the Mughal state with these elements engaged the attention of the court circles once again. Chūrāman Jat had abandoned the Saiyid brothers when the tide of fortune turned against them, and joined the Imperialists. However, on the eve of the battle of Ḥasanpur against 'Abdullāh Khān, he had deserted once again, and plundered the baggage in the rear of the Imperial armies. He continued his contumacious ways even after this, and aided the Bundelas in their opposition to Diler Khān, the deputy of Muḥammad Khān Bangash who was the governor of Allahabad. In 1721, Chūrāman harried the armies of Sa'adat Khān when the latter marched against Ajit Singh of Jodhpur. Matters came to a head, however, when in February 1722, Chūrāman's son, Mukham Singh, defeated and killed Nīlkanth Nāgar, the deputy of Sa'ādat Khān who was then the governor of Agra. Sa'ādat Khān failed to make any impression on the Jats. Hence, at the instance of Khān-i-Daurān, Jai Singh was appointed in April 1722 to lead an army against them.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>25</sup> J.R. (Misc. vol. i 75), Vad i 12.

<sup>26</sup> S.P.D. x 1, Dighe "Baji Rao", 13.

<sup>27</sup> S.P.D. xxx 269-71 and Nos. 333-4, K.K. 955.

Although Jai Singh was keenly desirous of curbing the Jat pretensions, with his previous failure in mind he refused to move till he was also appointed the Governor of Agra. This was done on September 1, 1722, and, soon afterwards, Jai Singh left Delhi at the head of an army of 14—15,000 sawārs. By this time, Chūrāman had died and his son, Mukham Singh, had assumed the leadership of the Jats.

Jai Singh laid siege to Thūn, the Jat stronghold, and proceeded by systematically cutting down the jungle, and closely investing the garrison. A couple of weeks passed in this way.<sup>29</sup> It is difficult to say how long the siege would have lasted, but dissensions broke out among the Jats. Badan Singh, the cousin of Mukham Singh, came over to the side of Jai Singh and pointed out the weak points in the Jat defences. Mukham Singh's position now became precarious. One night, he set fire to the houses, exploded the magazines, seized as much cash and jewellery as he could, and fled to Ajit Singh who gave him shelter. Jai Singh now entered the fortress in triumph and levelled it to the ground, having the ground ploughed up by asses as a sign of contempt.<sup>30</sup>

For this victory, Jai Singh received the title of Rajah-i-Rajeshwar. The terms granted to the Jats are not mentioned by any contemporary author. Badan Singh succeeded to the headship of the Jats, and received the zamindari of Chūrāman. It may be inferred that while the important fortresses were destroyed, Chūrāman's family was not deprived of the entire state they had gradually won. Henceforth, Badan Singh humbly styled himself a feudatory of Jai Singh. But apparently, he was a good administrator, and under his watchful stewardship the Jat house of Bharatpur gained in power silently and steadily for the next two decades. Thus, the set back to the growth of the Jat power was more apparent than real.

<sup>28</sup> Shiv Das, Irvine ii 120-121.

<sup>29</sup> Wāqī'ah Papers of the Maharaja's Army.

<sup>30</sup> Akhbārāt. Irvine (ii 123) gives November 18 as the date of the fall of Thūn.

The fall of the Saiyids from power also led to a number of changes in the political set-up in Rājputānā. During the period of Saiyid domination, Ajit Singh Rathor had risen to the position of being the most important of the Rājput Rajas, holding the ṣūbahdārī of both Gujarāt and Ajmer. Ajit Singh had always been an indifferent administrator, and his earlier Governorship evoked numerous complaints from the people of high-handedness and oppression on the part of the Raja and his subordinates. Moved by these complaints, in 1717 Farrukh Siyar had removed the Raja from his charge on the ground of "mis-government".<sup>31</sup> But when the Saiyids gained supreme control of affairs, they re-instated the Raja in his previous charge, and also appointed him the governor of Ajmer. But Ajit Singh once again left the affairs of Gujarāt in the hands of subordinates, refusing to leave Jodhpur and assume personal charge of the ṣūbah in spite of repeated and pressing requests from 'Abdullāh Khān.<sup>32</sup>

After the downfall of the Saiyids, the Emperor appointed Haider Qulī Khān as the governor of Gujarāt, and Muẓaffar 'Alī Khān, the younger brother of Khān-i-Daurān, as the Governor of Ajmer.<sup>33</sup> When Ajit Singh heard of this, he marched from Jodhpur at the head of 30,000 troops, and occupied Ajmer. After assuring the Muslims of the place that their religious practices would in no way be interfered with, he assembled all the chief men of the town and produced a nishān from Jahān Shāh, the Emperor's father, conferring upon him the perpetual governorship of Ajmer and Gujarāt. He also petitioned the Emperor to be allowed to retain charge of either Gujarāt or Ajmer.<sup>34</sup>

At the court, everything was in confusion. Muẓaffar 'Alī Khān, the governor-designate, had not proceeded a few stages beyond Delhi. He was a newly risen noble and lacked the means to raise a suitable force. The Imperial treasury was empty—the recent civil war having 31 See 127 above.

32 Bāl. 29, 5.

33 This was in Rajab 1133/May 1721. According to Mirāt, there was a rumour that Ajit Singh might be left in charge of Ajmer.

34 Siyar, 453 T. Muẓ. 317, K.K. 938 (confused), Mirāt ii 37-38, Iqbāl 375.

exhausted everything. The army was, in consequence, ill-paid and discontented. The court was full of factions and dissensions. In view of all this, Khān-i-Daurān favoured a settlement with Ajit Singh, arguing that even if he was beaten in the field, he would be-take himself to the mountains and deep valleys of his hereditary dominions, where no one would be able to pursue him.<sup>35</sup> In other words, he was afraid of the repetition of a situation like the one with which Aurangzīb had been faced in 1679. A rival faction, led by Haider Qulī and a number of other nobles, opposed the idea of leaving Ajit Singh in charge of Ajmer on the ground that it was adjacent to Delhi and contained innumerable shrines and places venerated by the Muslims.

While the court was still debating the issue, news was received that Muẓaffar 'Alī Khān's troops, having failed to receive their pay, had mutinied and seized everything on which they could lay their hands, compelling Muẓaffar 'Alī to seek shelter in Amber. Taking advantage of this situation, the Rathors under Abhai Singh raided the Imperial territories. In Narnol, the zamindars and local 'bandits' became so bold as to rise up in arms and plunder the town. Thus, the vacillation of the court worsened the situation.<sup>36</sup>

The ṣūbahdārī of Ajmer now went abegging. Khān-i-Daurān, Haider Qulī, and Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān the son of the late wazīr M. Amīn Khān accepted the post by turn, but shrank from the cost and the difficulty of the operation.

At last, Nuṣrat Khān-Bārahā was appointed to the vacant ṣūbahdārī. By this time, Nizām-ul-Mulk was approaching Agra from the Deccan. Ajit Singh now deemed discretion to be the better part of valour, and hastened to withdraw from Ajmer and to send letters of apology.<sup>37</sup> He could take this action without loss of prestige because through the

<sup>35</sup> Ibid.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid.

<sup>37</sup> K.K. 938, Siyar 453-54.

Elliot (vii 517) says that Nizām gave Ajit Singh "a sharp warning". This seems to be a mistranslation of the following passage from Khāfi Khān: "Dār-īn-zaman akhbār āmadān-i-Nizām-ul-Mulk Bahādur Fath Jang Rājah Ajit Singh rā az khwāb-i-ghaṣiāt bīdār sākht".

Later, Nizām expressed disapproval of the easy manner in which Ajit Singh's rebellion had been passed over (T. Hindī).

intercession of his friend, Khān-i-Daurān, he was pardoned and allowed to retain charge of Ajmer (March 1722). The motives of Khān-i-Daurān can only be guessed at. He may have desired to deprive Nizām-ul-Mulk of the credit of putting down the rebellion of Ajit Singh, as some historians allege. Or, he may have already started his attempts to bring into being a party consisting mainly of Indian-born Muslims and Rājput̃s to resist the narrow and exclusionist policies advocated by a section of the nobles.

As Ajit Singh was acutely distrusted by a powerful section at the court, it was decided to appoint Nāhar Khān, who was the faujdar of Sāmbhar and the dīwān of Gujarāt, as the dīwān at Ajmer. He was granted wide powers in order that he might act as a check on the Raja. Ajit Singh, who had an old aversion to Nāhar Khān, was enraged at this, and had the latter treacherously murdered when he entered Rājputānā and camped near the Rājput̃s in the mistaken belief that they were friendly. (January 6, 1723).<sup>38</sup>

When the news reached Muḥammad Shāh, he was enraged beyond words, and appointed an army under Sharf-ud-Daulah to "track the villanous Ajit to his rat's hole". Jai Singh, Girdhar Bahādur and others who had just finished the Jat campaign were asked to help him.<sup>39</sup> Just then, Haider Qulī Khān, who had fled from Gujarāt on Nizām-ul-Mulk approach, reached near Delhi. At Qamar-ud-Dīn's instance, he was pardoned and appointed the Governor of Ajmer.

Haider Qulī proceeded vigorously. He moved on Jodhpur by way of Sāmbhar. Ajmer was reached on June 8, 1723, and the new ṣūbahdār then beseiged Garh Patili. After a siege of a month and a half, the fort surrendered.<sup>40</sup>

Ajit Singh now deemed it opportune to sue for peace. He sent his son, Abhai Singh, to the Imperial commander with several elephants and presents. At the court, Khān-i-Daurān was as keen as ever to conciliate the Rajputs. Hence, Ajit Singh was pardoned and restored to his manṣab. His request for being exempted from personal appearance at the court was also granted.<sup>41</sup> Abhai Singh, the son of 38 Mir'āt ii 38.

39 J.R. Letters.

40 Kāmwar (B. M. Ms. 264-66), T. Hindī 497, Irvine ii 114.

41 Ibid.

Ajit Singh, appeared at the court in his place. Shortly afterwards, news arrived of the murder of Ajit Singh (January 7, 1724) at Jodhpur by one of his sons or by poisoning. Khān-i-Daurān now obtained for Abhai Singh the title of Rajah-i-Rajeshwar with the rank of 7000/7000, and the permission to leave for Jodhpur to occupy his father's gaddī.<sup>42</sup>

Thus, we see that the downfall of the Saiyids led to the loss of the pre-eminent position which the house of Jodhpur had acquired. But it did not result in the decline of the power and importance of the Rajputs as such. Jai Singh was appointed the Governor of Agra, and then of Malwa. He was the close personal friend of the chief Bakhshī Khān-i-Daurān, and wielded considerable influence at the Mughal court for more than a decade. Khān-i-Daurān also attempted to win over to his side Abhai Singh who retained an important position in Rājputānā. Thus, the Rājput̃s continued to play an important part in the politics at the Mughal court.

*

*

*

The departure of Nizām-ul-Mulk from the Court marks the end of an epoch in the history of the Mughal Empire during which a series of ambitious nobles attempted to save the empire from dissolution by concentrating supreme power in their own hands, and carrying out reforms in the administrative system. The withdrawal of Nizām-ul-Mulk signified that henceforth ambitious nobles would devote their energies to the carving out of separate principalities for themselves.

Outwardly, the main interest during the fore-going period centres round the attempts of the wazīrs to consolidate their position and their clash, in this process, with other powerful individuals and groups in the nobility and with the monarchy. Under-lying and interpenetrating this struggle was, however, another struggle—a struggle between those who wanted to revive and carry forward the liberal and nationalist traditions of Akbar and those who wanted to persist in the policy of exclusionism and religious discrimination which had become identified with the name of Aurangzīb.

The relationship between these two processes is by no means a simple one. Zu'lfīqār Khān and the Saiyid brothers attempted to strengthen their position by conciliating the Hindu sentiment in general.

<sup>42</sup> T. Muz 337.

and by winning over to their side the Rājputs and the Marāthās in particular. It would not be correct to assume that these nobles acted from interested motives only and that they deliberately pursued a policy in disregard of the interests of the Empire. Self-interest and conviction seem to have pushed them in the same direction.

In their clash with the Saiyid brothers, Nizām-ul-Mulk and M. Amīn Khān attempted to rally the 'Ālamgīrī nobles to their side by appealing to the sentiments of race and religion. After assuming control of the government, they attempted, therefore, to reverse many of the liberal and conciliatory measures adopted by the Saiyids. Thus, jizyah was sought to be re-imposed and a punitive expedition was sent against Ajit Singh, partly with the idea of putting the Rājputs in their proper place. But even these limited objectives could not be realized, largely because the position of the sections which favoured a tough policy towards the Rājputs and desired a strict enforcement of the various injunctions of the shara' had become weakened. It is significant that even 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān, who was considered to be a pillar of the "Tūrānī" faction and the "orthodox" group, opposed the proposal of Nizām-ul-Mulk for the re-imposition of jizyah.

From the account in the foregoing chapters, it will be apparent that the policy associated with the name of Aurangzīb was abandoned within half a dozen years of his death. Subsequent efforts to revive his policy did not find much support at the Mughal court itself. This suggests that the forces of liberalism in Indian society were really stronger than appears at first sight, and that the large number of orthodox measures introduced by Aurangzīb are not indicative of the final triumph of the forces of orthodoxy over those of liberalism in Indian society even for a limited period.

The defeat of the forces of orthodoxy at the Mughal court early in the eighteenth century was a factor of far-reaching importance. It restored the Mughal court to the position of being the leader of the movement for the promotion of a composite culture borrowing freely from the various cultural elements present in the country, a culture which was enriched by the contribution of the Hindus and the Muslims alike. The cultural importance of the Mughal court increased as its political importance diminished. The twin symbols of the new cultural process might be considered to be the Urdu language and the Emperor Muḥammad Shāh. From the time of Wālī Deccani Urdu came into its own at the Mughal court, and provided a new meeting point between the Hindus and the Muslims. Muḥammad Shāh extended his patronage to the fine arts and specially to music which made significant progress during his reign. The court also continued to occupy the position of being a school of manners for the entire polite society.

These developments were not without political significance. They helped to foster and to preserve cordial relations between the Hindu and Muslim upper classes in northern India and thus to prevent the prolonged political tussle between the Marāthās and the Mughal Empire from degenerating into a series of bitter communal feuds.

CHAPTER VIII

THE MARATHA ADVANCE TOWARDS NORTH INDIA

(1725-31)

The decade following the departure of Nizām-ul-Mulk from the Court and his establishment as a semi-independent ruler in the Deccan, witnessed a rapid shrinkage in the area under the actual control of the Mughal Emperor. It was during this period that hereditary Nawabs arose in a number of areas. Ever since his appointment to the Punjab in 1713, 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān had ruled it with little interference from outside, putting in an occasional appearance at the Court and sending his quota of tribute regularly. He died in 1726, and was succeeded by his son Zakariyah Khān who ruled in the same manner.<sup>1</sup> In Bengal, Murshid Qulī Khān, who had dominated the affairs of the province since the last years of Aurangzīb's reign, died in 1727. His death was followed by a civil war between his grandson, Sarfarāz Khān, and his son-in-law, Shuja' Khān, for the control of the province. The latter came out successful, and was duly recognized as the Governor by the Court.<sup>2</sup> Nothing could better illustrate the crumbling of Imperial authority. The case of Awadh was equally significant. Sa'ādat Khān had been appointed the Governor of Awadh in 1722, after the downfall of the Saiyids. He ruled Awadh with a high hand, and took possession of the jāgīrs of the Imperial manṣabdārs there, which led to a dispute with Muẓaffar Khān, the brother of the Bakhshī-ul-Mamālik Khān-i-Daurān, in 1726-27. As a result, Sa'ādat Khān was removed from Awadh, and appointed to Malwa. According to Imperial orders, Sa'ādat Khān left for Malwa, but from Agra he suddenly crossed the Jamuna, and proceeding to Awadh took possession of it.<sup>3</sup> Thus, even 1 M.U. ii 517. In 1737, Zakariyah Khān was also made the Governor of Multan.

2 Siyar 470, Riḡāz 277-8.

in areas near Delhi, powerful nobles began to set the Imperial authority at naught.

A further sign of the growing desire of the nobles to carve out independent principalities was that in Gujarāt each successive Governor had to eject his predecessor by force of arms.<sup>4</sup>

The Rājput Rajas were not slow to follow the example of the nobles. The Mughals had maintained a truce in Rājputānā, preventing the Rājputs from encroaching on areas outside Rājputānā, and also placing a check upon the ambitions of the stronger Rājput states to expand at the cost of their weaker neighbours. With the decline in Mughal power and prestige, the leading Rājput states felt free to resume the old process of conquest and expansion. Jai Singh Sawai cherished the ambition of establishing a hegemony from the Sāmbhar Lake in the west to Agra and Mathura in the east, and extending upto the Narmada in the south. By grants from the Emperor, usurpation and conquest he expanded considerably the dominion inherited by him.<sup>5</sup> A significant step in this direction was the crushing of the Jat power.

3 T. Hindī 508-9. Acc. to A. L. Srivastava, "First Two Nawabs", 78-79, the independent state of Awadh might be dated from this time.

4 Haider Qulī was the first to attempt independence in Gujarāt. After him, Hāmid Khān, then Sarbuland Khan, then Abhai Singh attempted to set themselves up as de facto rulers of the province (See Mirāt ii 45-166, Irvine ii 166-215 for details.) Sarbuland also seized all the parganas assigned in jāgīr to nobles and courtiers. (Mirāt 99.)

5 The Jaipur Records permit us to follow the expansion of Amber under Jai Singh in detail. Thus, May 27, 1714—Grant of Rs. 48,350 on pargana Bhangarh, probably a renewal (No. 35).

September 10, 1716: Grant of pargana Malarna in jāgīr then worth Rs. 3,33,272 per year (No. 48).

April 5, 1717: Grant of Rs. 80,000 jāgīr in pargana Amarsar.

October 9, 1717: jāgīr yielding Rs. 2½ crores given to his contingent. It included Umara and Barwar (No. 40).

In the following decade were wrested 50 parganas from Zain Khān of Jhunjhun, these being granted to him for a quit rent of Rs. 25 lakhs.

These were supplemented by conquests from his neighbours. Thus, in 1729, Jai Singh virtually annexed the Rāmpurā district from Udaipur, and attempted to bring Bundi under his vassalage by setting up his own nominee on its throne.

In 1731, he annexed many districts around Amber belonging to the Emperor (T. Hindī 524).

The Maharajas of Jodhpur, likewise, aggrandised themselves at the cost of their neighbours. They seized several areas belonging to the Mughal province of Gujarāt, and dreamt of a hegemony from Lake Sāmbhar to Ahmadabad and the sea.<sup>6</sup>

Apart from this, the period also witnessed the rapid growth of Afghan power in northern India. Between Delhi and Awadh, the Rohilla power was growing silently.<sup>7</sup> Muḥammad Khān Bangash set up a second Afghan centre at Farrukhābād, and attempted to subdue the war-like Bundelas. He led a cāmpaign into Bundelkhand in 1728, ostensibly aimed at the recovery of his jāgīrs which had been usurped by the Bundelas, but with the real object of establishing his influence in those quarters.<sup>8</sup> Khande Rai, the agent of Jai Singh, wrote that "seventy to eighty thousand Pathans in Gwalior and Dholpur, hearing the name of a Pathan, have flocked to him and are committing all manners of excesses".<sup>9</sup>

Thus, the sphere of the Emperor's effective authority rapidly shrank to an area extending in an arc roughly from Saharanpur to Nagor in the West, Farrukhābād in the east, and from the line of the Ganges in the North upto the Narmada in the south. Even inside this area, the Jats had usurped many areas, and the zamindars were raising their heads on every side, so that "every zamindar became a Raja, and every Raja a Maharaja".<sup>10</sup>

This was the background to the growing encroachment of the Marāthās on Malwa and Gujarāt. Only the utmost vigilance, resourcefulness and determination could have enabled the Delhi court with its depleted resources to successfully meet the Marāthā threat. As it was, the court remained engaged in factional squabbles, and woefully under-

6 The Rathors were attempting to seize the Shekhāwatī confederation, and in 1725 seized Nagore which was an imperial feudatory state. In 1733-4, Abhai Singh attempted to conquer Bikaner (Ojha, Hist. of Jodhpur, ii 608-10). As the Governor of Gujarāt, Ajit Singh annexed certain places which the Mughals failed to recover.

7 See Gulistān-i-Raḥmat, and Dr. B. Prasad's article "Ali Muḥammad Khan Ruhella" in J.I.H. vol. v 380-98.

8 J.A.S.B. 1878, 288-90.

9 J.R., Hindi letter d. 1724, v 47-48.

10 Āshūb 263.

estimated the Marāthā threat, leaving the local governors to cope with the situation as best as they could with their own limited resources. The result was that the Marāthās rapidly established themselves in these provinces, and made a bid for their out-right annexation. This posed a serious threat not only to the Delhi court, but also to all the other "principalities" in North as well as in South India.

It is outside the scope of this work to attempt to trace these events in detail. In the following pages, we shall study the various stages in the Marāthā conquest of Gujarāt, Malwa and Bundelkhand, and the impact of this process on north Indian politics and the parties at the Mughal Court. But first it is necessary to analyse briefly the origin and development of the Marāthā policy of expansion, and the relations between the Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk in the Deccan.

ii The Marāthās and their Policy of Expansion.

As has been noted already, the Marāthā movement was a complex movement, combining an earlier movement for socio-religious reform with the movement for regional independence led by the Marāthā sardars. There were contradictions between the political, socio-religious, and the economic aspects of the movement, these contradictions being rooted ultimately in the interests of different social groups. The Marāthā sardars, who were the dominant element in Marāthā society, had little interest in socio-religious reform, or in securing the welfare of the peasantry unless their own interests were involved. After the death of Shivaji, the peasantry was neglected, and the links between the political and the socio-religious reform movement were weakened. With the death of Aurangzīb and the withdrawal of the Mughal armies from Mahārāshtra, the divergence between the interests of the Marāthā sardars and the Maratha peasantry became even clearer. Intent on personal gain and plunder, the Marāthā sardars refused to subordinate their individual interests to the national good, and made the re-establishment of a centralized administrative system impossible. A seal was set on this process by Peshna Bālāji Vishwanāth who made a complex division of the revenues between Shāhū and his sardars in 1719. Broadly speaking, his system implied placing on the Marāthā sardars the entire responsibility for the collection of chauth and sardeshmukhi.

Out of these collections, a fixed share was to be paid to the Raja—sardeshmukhi plus 34% of the chauth. The Raja thus became largely dependent on his sardars for his finances. Care was also taken to divide the responsibility for the collection of chauth and sardeshmukhi in such a way that no individual Marāthā sardar could easily dominate a large, compact area. Inside Mahārāshtra, the semblance of a centralized system of administration under the care and supervision of the Peshwa was kept up. But here, too, the old evils of the system of zamindari asserted themselves.<sup>11</sup>

The arrangements made by Bālāji have often been criticised, and their defects are obvious enough. While the Marāthā sardars were given an added incentive for the plundering and over-running of the Mughal territory, they were made practically independent of the King. In the ultimate resort, there was no substitute for a strong central authority if the Marāthā movement was to hold together. But the arrangements should be regarded as reflecting a particular political reality, rather than an ideal set of regulations. The hope of effective political unity among the Marāthās centred more and more in the institution of the Peshwa which became a prime factor in Marāthā politics from this time onwards.

The real founder of the institution of the hereditary Peshwa was Baji Rao. In 1720 Shāhū appointed Baji Rao to the vacant office of his father, in recognition of the signal services of the latter. There is no clear evidence that at this juncture Shāhū regarded the post as hereditary in the family of Bālāji<sup>12</sup> though the incumbents of the leading posts already tended to regard them as their hereditary preserves. Baji Rao placed the issue beyond doubt by his success in the field of battle, and by steadily arrogating authority to his office till it became the focal point in the Marāthā political system.

The rapid decline of the power of the Mughals, and the conflict between various factions at the court gave an opportunity to the Marāthā sardars which they were not slow to seize. The struggle now was no longer one for the national survival and freedom of the Marāthās, but for the domination and control of as much land as possible. This change from the defensive to the offensive by the Marāthās, from struggle for national survival to empire building was not accomplished over-night. The change in the character of the struggle was becoming apparent during the last years of Aurangzīb's reign when the Marāthās began regular raids into Gujarāt and Malwa. But the new trend was not given the shape of a definite policy till the coming of Baji Rao to the scene. A prolonged controversy at the Marāthā court between Baji Rao and the Pratinidhi Shripat Rao preceded the adoption of the new policy. From the near-contemporary account of Chitnis,<sup>13</sup> a rough idea may be formed of the approach and general line of argument adopted by the two men, though it would be dangerous to accept literally the purple passages and the long speeches put by Chitnis in the mouth of the protagonists. Apparently, the main issues posed were: (i) the direction and timing of Marāthā expansionist activities, (ii) the attitude of Nizām-ul-Mulk and the possibility of maintaining friendly relations with him, and (iii) internal administration, and particularly the problem of controlling the Marāthā sardars and of putting the finances and the army etc. in order. Lastly there was the question of power—who was to dominate the councils of the King, the Peshwa or the Pratinidhi?

11 See Sen, "Adm. System", 272-73, Duff 370-76.

12 See K. & P. ii 182, 183 for the Pratinidhi Shripatrao's arguments against the appointment of Baji Rao.

The Pratinidhi was not opposed to an expansionist policy as such, but he wanted that attention should first be given to the over-running of the Konkan where the Sidi of Janjira had recovered many areas, and the completion of the conquest of the Karnātak begun by Shivaji. After consolidating Marāthā positions in the Deccan, they could think of conquest further afield in northern India. The Pratinidhi emphasised the necessity of caution, and of not provoking the Mughals too far lest it bring another invasion of the Marāthā homeland. Above all, he was keen to be-friend the powerful Nizām-ul-Mulk. Hence, he wanted that large scale expansionist activities should be deferred till the finances had been placed on a sound basis, and a strong army and a stable administrative system created.

On the other hand, Baji Rao dwelt upon the weakness and imbecility of the Mughal Court which was torn by factions and internecine feuds so that Marāthā aid was sought, and by its means kings were made and unmade. He dismissed the conquest of the Karnātak as a domestic affair which could be left to the Huzarat (house-hold) troops. Pointing to Shivaji's dream of a Hindu domination, he dwelt upon the (alleged) friendship of the Hindu powers to the Marāthās, and discounted the power of the Nizam, offering to hold him in check as well as to effect a northward drive. Finally, he appealed to the predatory instincts of the Marāthā sardars by pointing to the riches of northern India, the Deccan having been reduced to ruin by prolonged warfare. He is supposed to have ended with the famous words, "Strike, strike at the trunk and the branches will fall of themselves. Listen but to my counsel and I shall plant the Marāthā banner on the walls of Attock".<sup>14</sup>

13 Chitnis, Life of Shahu Maharaj, 60-61 et passim.

It does not seem correct to imagine that Baji Rao's policy of northward expansion implied that he was disinterested in the south.<sup>15</sup> As early as the year 1724, when the Emperor had asked for Marāthā help against Nizām-ul-Mulk, Baji Rao had demanded the cessation of the ṣūbah of Hyderabad, and the virtual right to nominate the Mughal viceroy of the Deccan.<sup>15</sup>

Thus, Baji Rao too, was interested in Marāthā supremacy over the Deccan. But he did not apparently share the Pratinidhi's facile optimism that the Marāthās could over-run the Karnātak without the bitter opposition of the Nizam, or that they could obtain the mastery of the Deccan in the face of a clever and determined foe like Nizām-ul-Mulk with the resources of Mahārāshtra alone. Hence his fixed determination of over-running and bringing under Marāthā domination the rich and flourishing provinces of Malwa and Gujarāt. Marāthā sardars had raided and regularly exacted contributions from these provinces since the early part of the century. Baji Rao gave to these sporadic raids a systematic form and political content, for he perceived as well the political and strategic value of these provinces. With the Marāthās securely established in Malwa and Gujarāt, a wedge would be interposed between the Nizam and Delhi. The Marāthās would then surround the Nizam's territories on three sides, and could, at their convenience, turn against the Nizam without fear of his getting succor from Delhi, or raid the dū'āb and the regions to the east and west of it.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid.

<sup>15</sup> S.P.D. x 1. The Deccan figured prominently in Baji Rao's negotiations with the Emperor in 1736, and with Nizām-ul-Mulk after the battle of Bhopal in 1738.

Thus, the establishment of a Marāthā domination in Malwa and Gujarāt was the first step to the establishment of a large and powerful Marāthā empire. It seems historically inaccurate to think that Baji Rao set himself any tasks beyond this. His peroration about the planting of the Marāthā flag on the Attock was only a politician's hyperbole. The task was clearly beyond Marāthā strength for a long time to come, and Baji Rao was too much of a practical statesman to set before himself any such impossible objectives.

iii The Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk.

Marāthā relations with Nizām-ul-Mulk passed through a number of phases, and had a considerable bearing on Marāthā activities in Malwa and Gujarāt.

As the Viceroy of the Deccan, from 1715 to 1717, Nizām-ul-Mulk resisted the Marāthā claims for the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan, and was almost constantly at war with them—though with little lasting success. After his successful rebellion against the Saiyids, Nizām-ul-Mulk respected the Imperial farmān granting the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan to the Marāthā, but resisted the stationing of Marāthā agents in the neighbourhood of the capital, Aurangabad. Shortly afterwards, on January 4, 1721, he had his first personal meeting with Baji Rao.<sup>16</sup> Though Nizām-ul-Mulk established friendly relations with the young Peshwa, no lasting agreement resulted. The most important point of conflict between the Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk was the Karnātak. Nizām-ul-Mulk looked upon the Karnātak as his by right of succession to the kingdoms of Bijapur and Golkonda. However, scant attention was paid to his claims by the Marāthās who had been interested in the Karnātak at least since the time of Shahji, and had always regarded it as a kind of happy hunting ground which they were determined to plunder and to lay under contribution.<sup>17</sup>

<sup>16</sup> S.P.D. xxx 266, No. 909, and apparently the meeting referred to in x 5, 10, 11. See also Dr. Powar's paper, loc. cit., J.H.R.C. XVII 204-15, Riyasat 160-1.

In October, 1721, Nizām-ul-Mulk left Aurangābād for Delhi, and did not return till 1724. During his absence, his deputy, Mubārīz-ul-Mulk, repudiated the agreement for chauth and so there was a general resumption of hostilities with the Marāthās. However, Nizām-ul-Mulk attempted to maintain good relations with the Marāthās, and not Bajī Rao in Malwa in 1723, with the results already noted.<sup>18</sup>

When Nizām-ul-Mulk rebelled in 1724, the Emperor attempted to enlist the support of the Marāthā sardars against him and wrote to Shāhū. Mubārīz Khān also opened direct negotiations with the Marāthās.<sup>19</sup> Nizām-ul-Mulk check-mated these moves by arranging another personal meeting with Bajī Rao. Bajī Rao was present at Shakar Khera with a contingent of Marāthā horsemen which did good service, and for which Nizām-ul-Mulk rewarded Bajī Rao.<sup>20</sup> It has been suggested that in return for Marāthā support, Nizām-ul-Mulk agreed not to oppose Marāthā advance into Malwa and Gujarāt.<sup>21</sup>

17 Nizām-ul-Mulk marched upto the Fardāpur pass in 1721 to check Ghorpāde's invasion of the Karnātak, and near Trichinopoly, the Mughal and Maratha forces clashed (Āṣaf Jūh 139-40, Vad i No. 3).

18 See 173 above.

19 Mubārīz Khān was advised by some well-wishers to seek the help of Kanhoji Bhosle, but he did not accept the suggestion. (Riyasat 169).

From an extant letter of Kanhoji to Jai Singh, it appears that Kanhoji was prepared to help, but the Khan disdained to accept it. Kanhoji wrote, "According to the farmān of H.M. and the letter of that Most High Raja (Jai Singh), Mubārīz had been provided with 10,000 horse and other necessities of war, and asked not to fight till he reached these quarters. The Khan did not do so, and on account of haste gave up his life". (J.R., Misc. Vol. i No. 277).

Shāhū had instructed Kanhoji to remain neutral in the conflict between Nizām and Mubārīz. (Vad i 12).

20 K.K. 955, S.P.D. xxx Nos. 333-4. According to T. Fatḥiyah (quoted in Āṣaf Jūh 162), Nizām-ul-Mulk conferred upon Bajī Rao a manṣab of 7000 in recognition of his services.

21 Dighe 13, Dr. Powar, I.H.R.C. XVII, 207. But in two extant letters to Jai Singh, Nizām-ul-Mulk vigorously denies the charge, pointing to the greatly enhanced power of the Marāthās and his difficulties in attempting to meet their threat. (J.R., Letters, Vol. V No. 485).

It was against this back-ground that Baji Rao and the Pratinidhi disputed about the future Marāthā relations with Nizām-ul-Mulk. The Pratinidhi had some reason to hope for the continued goodwill of Nizām-ul-Mulk, especially as the victory over Mubārīz Khān had been followed by two joint Marāthā-Nizam expeditions into the Karnātak. But the Pratinidhi failed to comprehend the deeper purpose of Nizām-ul-Mulk, and the inner motives of his policy. Faced with the implacable hostility of the Delhi Court, Nizām-ul-Mulk was not loth to acquiesce in Baji Rao's schemes of expansion towards the north. But he could not afford to let the Marāthās grow so powerful as to bring Malwa and Gajarāt completely under their sway. This would isolate him from Delhi, and jeopardize his position in the Deccan. Hence, the policy of Nizām-ul-Mulk was to ward off the hostility of both the Court and the Marāthās by keeping them embroiled with one another, and, at the same time, not to allow one of them to become so powerful as to dominate the other. He wanted to keep the Marāthās at play by professions of friendship, yet keep a line open to Delhi in case the Marāthās grew too powerful. He also attempted to interpose internal checks on the growth of Marāthā power by allying with disgruntled groups and individuals among the Marāthās while he conserved and consolidated his own power. It was a complex policy, and required a shrewd and calculating politician like Nizām-ul-Mulk to work it. While Nizām-ul-Mulk sometimes over-reached himself, he was successful, on the whole, in maintaining his position, and evoked a grudging admiration even from Baji Rao who strove for good relations with him even while resisting his intrigues and opposing him by force of arms at times.

In 1728, affairs between Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Marāthās moved towards war. Nizām-ul-Mulk was uneasy and apprehensive at the growing sweep of Marāthā operations in Malwa and Gujarāt. He also resented Marāthā encroachments in the Karnātak and though he joined in the two expeditions to the Karnātak launched by Shāhū in 1725-26 and 1726-27, he issued secret orders to his commander to oppose the Marāthās.<sup>22</sup> Hostility between the courts of Satara and Kolhapur, and the differences between Baji Rao and the Pratinidhi helped him. While the bulk of the Marāthā armies were in the Karnātak, he suspended payment of chauth and sardeshmukhi on the ground of a dispute upon the matter between Shāhū and Shambhāji (the Kolhapur Raja), and posing as the representative of the Mughal Emperor, invited Shāhū to submit the dispute to his arbitration. He also sent him messages suggesting the dismissal of Baji Rao. In the meantime, he effected a junction with the armies of the Kolhapur Raja.<sup>23</sup>

22 Sardesai, New Hist. ii 90-91.

Shāhū was dumb-founded and was almost persuaded to accept Nizām-ul-Mulk's claim for arbitration. But he quickly recovered, and sent express messages of recall to the Marāthā forces, alerting the commanders of the Marāthā forts for defence. Hurrying back from the Karnātak, Baji Rao decided on immediate war, rejecting the peace overtures made by Nizām-ul-Mulk who had no real desire for war.<sup>24</sup> After a brief but brilliant campaign, Baji Rao brought Nizām-ul-Mulk to bay at Palkhed. On March 6, 1728, by the treaty of Mungi Shivgaon, Nizām-ul-Mulk re-affirmed Shāhū's claim for the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan, and agreed not to offer any protection to Shambhāji of Kolhapur.<sup>25</sup>

While it is historically wrong to imagine that this treaty established Marāthā supremacy in the south,<sup>26</sup> it did place the claims of Shāhū to the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan beyond dispute. It also enabled Baji Rao to finally supplant the Pratinidhi at Shāhū's court, and to devote his undivided attention to the affairs of Malwa and Gujarāt. But it was not long before Nizām-ul-Mulk re-commenced his intrigues. The presence of Nizām-ul-Mulk in the Deccan and his constant intrigues made Baji Rao tread warily, and rendered more difficult his task of establishing a Marāthā hegemony in Malwa and Gujarāt.

23 Ḥadīqat 138. For details, see Dighe 14-18, Āṣaf Jāh 185-87. The exact nature of Shambhāji's claims is not clear. He apparently claimed the right to realise sardeshmukhi from the Karnātak, and regarded Shāhū's expeditions in that area as encroachments.

24 Duff ii 407.

25 S.P.D. xv 90-91. See also New Hist., ii 98-100, Dighe 20.

26 Cf. Dighe 20.

iv The Marāthā Advance into Malwa and Gujarāt.

Gujarāt had been raided by the Marāthās intermittantly since 1705, and Malwa since 1699; but it was only after 1720 that the Marāthā raids in these provinces became a regular and organised feature in pursuance of a fixed policy on the part of the Peshwa. Although claims to the chauth of Malwa and Gujarāt had been advanced as early as the reign of Shivaji, they do not seem to have been officially put forward in any negotiations with the Mughals till 1717. In that year, in the course of his negotiations with Ḥusain 'Alī, Shāhū asked for the recognition of the Marāthā claims over Gujarāt and Malwa. At the time of his visit to Delhi in 1719, Bālājī Vishwanāth was instructed to try and secure the chauth of these two provinces also.<sup>27</sup>

These claims were not conceded, and Marāthā raids into the two provinces assumed larger and larger proportions. In 1724, when Nizām-ul-Mulk rebelled, both he and the Emperor bid for Marāthā support. The Marāthās once again demanded the recognition of their claims over the two provinces.<sup>28</sup> But in view of the financial and strategic importance of these provinces, neither of the two was prepared to hold out any such promise to the Marāthās. However, after his defeat by Baji Rao in 1728, Nizām-ul-Mulk was compelled for some time to disregard the Marāthā advance in Malwa and Gujarāt, and even to connive at the passage of their armies across his territory.<sup>29</sup> Thus, it was not till 1728 that the Mughals felt the full brunt of the Marāthā strength in Malwa and Gujarāt.

It is not necessary for our purposes to trace in detail the progress of Marāthā arms in Gujarāt and Malwa. The Marāthā conquest of these provinces proceeded in three stages. The first stage was the establishment of their claim for chauth and sardeshmukhi. Next, this claim was substituted by a demand for the cessation of territory, and the provinces were divided into spheres of influence among the Marāthā sardars. The final step was outright annexation.

In Gujarāt, the Marāthā claim for the chauth and sardeshmukhi

<sup>27</sup> Duff i 273, Chitnis 51.

<sup>28</sup> S.P.D. x i.

<sup>29</sup> Siyar 463-64.

of the ṣūbah were accepted by the Imperial governor, Sarbuland Khān, in May 1726.<sup>30</sup> The principle of chauth and sardeshmukhi having been once conceded in the Deccan, there could be little moral objection to a similar arrangement for Gujarāt, if it was demonstrated that the Marāthās were too strong to be successfully resisted by force of arms. But the grant of chauth and sardeshmukhi did not result in the cessation of the plundering activities of the Marāthā sardars. The chief lieutenants of the Dabhade, Pilāji Gaekwar and Kanthā Kadam, fell out among themselves over the division of the chauth, resulting in constant fights between them. Further, Baji Rao contested the claim of the Pratinidhi who had been assigned the chauth of Gujarāt by Shāhū. In February, 1727, the governor Sarbuland Khān made a pact with Baji Rao stipulating for the payment of chauth, provided Baji Rao helped to establish peace in the province.<sup>31</sup> But Baji Rao was too busy in the Deccan and then in Malwa, so that the pact was not confirmed. Meanwhile, the Marāthā sardars gradually seized 28 districts of Gujarāt, i.e. the entire south Gujarāt.<sup>32</sup> In 1730, Baji Rao entered Gujarāt politics again. The earlier agreement for chauth was confirmed by Sarbuland Khān in April 1730.<sup>33</sup> This resulted in his being replaced by Abhai Singh. However, Abhai Singh also signed a pact with Baji Rao in February, 1731, by which he agreed to pay a fixed sum of 13 lakhs in lieu of chauth, on condition

30 Vad i No. 105. An order d. 1 Ramāṣṭan 1138 H. [May 3, 1726 sets out the basis on which the chauth of Gujarāt was to be divided among the various Marāthā sardars. Irvine (ii 192-93) dates this settlement in October 1726, apparently on the basis of Mirāt (ii 92-93). But this was only a confirmation of the earlier agreement signed by Sarbuland Khān with Ambāji Pant Purandare.

31 S.P.D. xv 86, 84-5. The English date given by the Editor is wrong. It should be 20 February, 1727 (o.s.) or 2 March (n.s.). The terms were modelled on Husain 'Alī's agreement of 1719. The Marāthās were to maintain peace, and to keep 2,500 horsemen for the service of the Governor in return for chauth, and were not to send more than 2-3 men in each district as collectors. In return for sardeshmukhi, they were to give a peshkash of Rs. 4,13,080|13|-.

32 S.P.D. xv 82.

33 Letters of Abhai Singh, (quoted by V. Reu, I.H.R.C. 1938, 124-126; 1942, 328-32).

that Baji Rao expelled Gaekwar and Kanthā Kadam from Gujarāt.<sup>34</sup>

Thus, by 1731 the Marāthās had not only secured recognition of their right of chauth and sardeshmukhi of Gujarāt from the governor, but also obtained control of the districts from which they could effectively realise their claims. The defeat of the Dabhade at the hands of Baji Rao at Tiloi in 1731 did not improve matters for Abhai Singh. Shāhū now patched up an agreement between the two sardars, and assigned the greater part of Gujarāt to the Dabhade.

Despairing of ousting the Marāthās by force of arms, in 1733 Abhai Singh invited Pilāji Kaekwar to a conference, and treacherously murdered him. However, this was of little avail to him. The Marāthās rallied under Uma Bai Dabhade to avenge the death of one of their prominent sardars. Abhai Singh soon found the situation beyond his control, and withdrew into Marwar. The stage was now set for the next step, annexation. The rest of the province rapidly passed under Marāthā sway. It only remained to legalise the position by a formal grant from the Emperor.<sup>35</sup>

The first concerted move for the enforcement of the claim for chauth from Malwa was made under the leadership of Baji Rao in 1723.<sup>36</sup> In 1725, regular Marāthā officials, such as Keso Mahādeo, Keso Vishwanāth, Godāji Deokolā and Udāji Pawār were appointed to collect chauth from south Malwa.<sup>37</sup>

In June, 1725, Girdhar Bahādūr was appointed the ṣūbahdār of 34 Mirāt ii 134-5. This was really a renewal of the pact signed the previous year by Sarbuland Khān. Baji Rao was to get six lakhs immediately, and the remainder after he had expelled Kanthaji and left those parts (Surat Factory Diary, 614).

35 In 1736, in the course of his negotiations with the Emperor, Baji Rao demanded the cessation of both Malwa and Gujarāt. (Siyar 468-69).

A last effort was made by the Imperialists to recover Gujarāt in 1740 by appointing Fakr-ud-Daulah, the brother of Roshan-ud-Daulah, as the governor of Gujarāt, (T. Muṣ. 420). But the governor-designate did not even leave for his charge. The last traces of Mughal rule in Gujarāt disappeared with the fall of Ahmedabad in 1753.

36 Baji Rao's Roznishi 223-4, S.P.D. xiii 3, xxx 310.

37 S.P.D. xii 6-9.

Malwa. He was a man of courage and determination and refused to surrender to the Marāthās. He turned out the Marāthā kamāvishdārs, and disregarded the representations of Shāhū not to disturb the collection of chauth. Dayā Ram, the cousin of Girdhar Bahādur, moved about the province with a well-equipped army, and showed great activity in chasing out the Marāthā sardars.<sup>38</sup> Thus began a conflict which ended only with the death of Girdhar Bahādur and Dayā Ram at the battle of Amjharā in November, 1728.<sup>39</sup> Baji Rao then swept into Bundelkhand, and beseiged M. Khān Bangash at Jaitpur, forcing the latter to relinquish all his conquest in Bundelkhand. In return, the grateful Raja agreed to pay chauth.<sup>40</sup> The Marāthā armies camped in Malwa throughout that summer. Three years later, Baji Rao divided the province into spheres of influence among his sardars.<sup>41</sup>

v The North Indian Reaction.

The ever-extending sweep of the Marāthā operations and their growing demands and aspiration caused serious concern to the Delhi Court and to the various semi-independent or autonomous princes and nawabs of north India, such as the Kachhwāhās of Amber, the Rathors of Jodhpur, the Bundelas, Sa'adat Khān of Awadh, etc.

None of these had any desire to see the Delhi government regain its power and authority. At the same time, they could not ignore the Marāthā threat, or repel it by their individual efforts. The need of the hour was a united front. But their mutual jealousies and suspicions made the forging of such a front a difficult task. Much depended on the attitude of the Emperor and his advisors. If they followed a well-defined and firm policy, many of the princes and the nawabs could perhaps be induced to help. Lack of firmness at the Delhi court led to wavering in their ranks, and efforts to make individual deals with the Marāthās, thereby accelerating the process of the disintegration of the political and moral authority of the Emperor. Thus, the Marāthā advance towards north India accentuated the inner problems of the empire and hastened its internal decay. For all practical purposes, 38 S.P.D. xiii 6-9, Ajā'ib No. 180. For details see R. Sinh, 'Malwa', 158-62.

39 S.P.D. xiii 28, 25, 27, 17; Ajā'ib Nos. 182, 201; 'Malwa', 164-5, 199-207.

40 S.P.D. xii 38,39, xxx 55, 304-6; J.A.S.B. 1878, 297-302.

41 S.P.D. xxii 54, 82.

North India became divided into a number of semi-independent states or principalities, each determining its own interests.

In the following pages, we shall attempt to analyse the attitude of the various North Indian powers towards the Marāthās, and their relations with each other and the Court.

Jai Singh Sawai dominated the affairs of Amber from his succession to the gaddī in 1700 to his death in 1743. His attitude towards the Marāthās during this long period under went several changes as might well be expected. In 1701, at the seigs of Khelna, he did good service against the Marāthās, and was rewarded by a rise (or rather restoration) of his manṣab. Subsequently, he performed good service in guarding Khandesh and Malwa from the depredations of the Marāthās, and was nominated the nā'ib ṣūbahdār of Malwa by Bīdār Bakht. But Aurangzib disapproved of his appointment.<sup>42</sup>

As the Governor of Malwa from 1713 to 1715, Jai Singh put up a stout resistance to the Marāthās, and inflicted a crushing defeat upon them in 1713, so that the Marāthās kept away from Malwa for two years.<sup>34</sup> Jai Singh's absence from Malwa after 1715 with half the Kachhwāhā contingent in connection with the Jat campaign, and the negligence of his deputy, encouraged the Marāthās to resume their raids. Jai Singh was keen to return to the province after his unsuccessful Jat campaign. The Emperor promised to depute a high noble with a powerful army to clear the province of the 'Deccanis' in co-operation with him.<sup>44</sup> But in November, 1717, the province was suddenly taken away from him, and given to M. Amīn Khān.

Jai Singh did not come into direct contact with the Marāthās again till October, 1729, when he was appointed the Governor of Malwa for the second time. His Governorship did not last more than a couple of months. In 1732, Jai Singh became the governor of Malwa for the third time, and accepted the Marāthā claim for chauth. In 1735, he invited Baji Rao to northern India in order to induce the Emperor to accept his demands and to make peace with the Marāthās.

<sup>42</sup> 'Ināyat 68a, 72b, 75a-b.

<sup>43</sup> See 121 above.

<sup>44</sup> J.R. (Add. Pers. ii 160).

It is obvious that between 1719 and 1732 a big change took place in Jai Singh's attitude towards the Marāthās. It is now possible with the help of the mass of the Persian and Marathi records available to us to determine the time and the causes of this striking change.

We are told that contact between Jai Singh and the young Peshwa, Baji Rao, was first established in 1719, when Bālājī Vishwanāth and Baji Rao accompanied Husain Alī to Delhi to receive the sanads of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan. Though no occasion can be found when Jai Singh could have met Bālājī Vishwanāth and Baji Rao at Delhi as asserted by Duff,<sup>45</sup> it is possible that some kind of an indirect contact was established between these two important personages, either at this time or soon afterwards. This appears likely as it is now clear that a Marāthā envoy lived at Delhi almost without a break after Bālājī's visit of 1719. The names of Malhār Dādājī Barwe, Anand Rao Sumant, Dādājī Pant Nānā and Mahādeo Bhatt Hingane might be mentioned in this connection.<sup>46</sup> It is certain that by 1725, direct 45 Duff i 393. Riyasat (80) says that Shankarājī Malhār was instrumental in establishing friendship between Jai Singh and the Peshwa.

Jai Singh remained at Amber during the entire period when the Saiyids were the de facto rulers at Delhi.

46 Hingane (probably Govind Pant s/o Mahādev Bhatt) returned from Delhi with the Peshwa, and Shankarājī followed with the sanads. (Hingane Daftar, Nos. 8, 9; Marāthā Wakils i, Burhān-ul-Futūḥ 167a). But Mahādev Dādājī Barwe continued to live at Delhi, and in 1720, after the assassination of Husain 'Alī, sent an "express" to Baji Rao, urging him to come forward boldly and to seize the vacant situation at the court (S.P.D. xxx 24).

In 1721, Anand Rao Sumant accompanied Nizām-ul-Mulk to Delhi (S.P.D. xxii 3), but he seems to have left soon afterwards, for he was with Mubārīz Khān in 1722 (Riyasat 163). In his alleged speech before Shāhū urging the Marāthās to strike at the root of the Empire, Baji Rao mentions one Dādājī Pant Nānā who had prepared the ground for Marāthā expansion by establishing friendly relations with the Rājput Rajas. (Chitnis, 61). This would be in 1722 or 1726.

An entry dated 1724 in the Peshwa's Roznishi (expense register) mentions that Rs. 2,000/- was paid to Māyā Ram Wakil, at Delhi, as his salary for the previous year (S.P.D. xxx No. 353). Māyā Ram is again mentioned as the Wakil at Delhi in 1728 (S.P.D. xxii 40). From 1732, Yādav Rao Prahlād lived at Delhi as the accredited Marāthā representative. Hingane relations had been established between the Rājput princes and the Marāthās. According to two extant papers in the Jaipur Records, a Marāthā agent named Jadu Rai reached Udaipur in 1725 and opened negotiations with the Rājput Rajas for a general peace settlement. It appears that Jai Singh and the Mahārānā proposed the following terms:

[continued]

(i) Shāhū should be taken into Imperial service, and granted jāgīrs worth 10 lakhs in each of the two provinces (of Gujarāt and Malwa), and (ii) four of Shāhū's principal men should be called and accorded manṣabs.<sup>47</sup>

The Rajas forwarded these proposals to the Emperor, and while emphasising their loyalty to him and their readiness to abide by his wishes, expressed the opinion that it would be in the best interests of the Empire to accept them. They also suggested to Sarbuland Khān, the Governor of Gujarāt, that he should come to an agreement with the Peshwa, and advised him to write direct to Shāhū before they put him in touch with his plenipotentiary, Jadu Rai.<sup>48</sup>

However, the Rajas privately entertained doubts whether the terms would satisfy the Marāthās who, they felt "really want the chauth of Malwa and Gujarāt which comes to 50 lakhs (annually)." They were also suspicious of the Marāthā bona fides. Thus, in a letter to Jai Singh the Mahārānā writes. "The Deccanis are extremely selfish: you yourself know them well". In another letter, he urges that "the salvation of the (Rājput) Rajas lay in uniting against the Deccanis".<sup>49</sup>

The hopes of the Rajas for a compromise were based on the existence of internal differences among the Marāthās, and the friendship is again mentioned as being at Delhi in 1734, but he does not seem to have been posted to Delhi till Baji Rao's death. (Hingane Daftar 8-9).

47 J.R. (Hindi Letters, v 65-8, 85-6). These were apparently the terms proposed by the Marāthā Wakil himself.

48 Ibid.

49 J.R.: memorandum from Rana Sangram Singh to Jai Singh, d. Ashād Sudi 24, 1782/July 24, 1726 (N.S.) [The date will be 1725 if the year used is not Shrāvanūdi. But the paper contains a reference to Sarbuland Khan in Gujarāt, and Sarbuland did not reach Gujarāt till December 1725. Hence, the date 1725 indicated by Sir Jadunath in the margin does not seem to be correct. (Hindi Letters, v 65-8)].

of the Nizam. "Previously, when the elder Maharaja (Jai Singh) went against the Deccanis, Shivaji laid the keys of his 84 forts before him," wrote an anonymous observer from Udaipur. "But these are not so (strong). There is an internal enemy in their camp: there is not one kingdom but two. This will be a source of happiness and success (for us). Their power is as yet new (literally, only four days old) but they are gaining strength daily..... The Nizam is friendly to us".<sup>50</sup>

It is difficult to decide whether a lasting agreement with the Marāthās was possible on the term proposed by the two Rajas. The Marāthās were in the habit of regarding every concession as a sign of weakness, and raising fresh demands till they became the dominant partners.<sup>51</sup> On the other hand, the Peshwa did not, as yet, know the full measure of his own power, and he had to reckon with the hostility of the Nizam, and the opposition of the Pratinidhi at home. Shāhū's influence, too, was cast on the side of moderation. The financial condition of the Marāthā kingdom was unsatisfactory, and it is possible that in return for a fixed annual sum of 20 lakhs the Marāthās would have been willing to give up their claim for the full chauth of Malwa, and save themselves the cost of years of difficult campaigning with no guarantee of success.

The motives of the two Rajas in urging such a pact can only be guessed at. They might have felt that the claims of the Marāthās were irresistible in the long run, and that it was in the best interests of the Empire to accept them gracefully while there was still time, before they were faced with other exorbitant Marāthā demands, and the claim for the full amount of the chauth of the two provinces.

Jai Singh might also have hoped that in case of an agreement with the Marāthās, he would be able to secure the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa for himself, and thus extend his sphere of influence upto the Narmada. But there does not seem anything treasonable in the proposals. The attempts of some modern writers to prove that Jai Singh acted out of religious sympathy for the Marāthā ideal of a Hindu-pad-padshahi seems to rest on the doubtful veracity of some letters in the Mandloi

50 J.R. (Hindi Letters, v 85-6).

51 Cf. Duff 432.

daftar.<sup>52</sup> It is not borne out by the activities of Jai Singh, or by the contemporary Persian chronicles and Marāthā records.<sup>53</sup>

In October, 1729, Jai Singh was appointed as the Governor of Malwa for the second time. He once again urged peace with the Marāthās by conceding to them the chauth of Malwa and Gujarāt, setting forth his arguments in a remarkable memorandum which he submitted to the Emperor. He pointed out that the "Marāthās had tasted Malwa for a long time past. If this year, by reason of our heavy concentration of troops, they were unable to enter the ṣūbah or are chastised (after they have entered), you know what heavy expenditure would be necessary for this object every year in the future. I, therefore, suggest that as Raja Shāhū has been ranked as an Imperial manṣabdār since the days of Aurangzīb, Your Majesty should give him a jāgīr worth ten lakhs of rupees in the name of his (adopted) son, Khushāl Singh, on condition that he prevents any future disturbance in Malwa, and an auxiliary contingent of his troops serves the ṣūbahdār of that province. This will give peace to the land and save us from the expense of campaigning (every year)".<sup>54</sup>

Thus, it is evident that Jai Singh urged the same policy as a shrewd politician like Nizām-ul-Mulk pursued throughout his life<sup>55</sup> and recommended to his sons from his death bed—a policy of trying to 52 R. Sinh (Malwa, 96-8, 196-9 and Appendix I) has established conclusively that the alleged letters of Jai Singh expressing sympathy with the political objectives of the Marāthās are crude forgeries.

53 The graveman of the charge brought against Jai Singh by some of the contemporary Persian chronicles is that he calmly sat at home, supervising the building of Jaipur, and was content to let Imperial governors be defeated without doing anything to help them. (Wārid 119-20, Qāsim 379, Āshūb). But some other writers make similar charges against Nizām-ul-Mulk (cf. T. Hindī 550).

54 J.R. (Add. Pers, ii No. 188, see Appendix B).

55 Thus, in 1725, Nizām-ul-Mulk wrote to Jai Singh, "Previously the co-ordination and efforts of many ṣūbahdārs were required to subdue the Marāthās. In the time of Aurangzīb and other Emperors before him, immense treasure was spent for this purpose, and high Rajas—both cash-holders and jāgīrdārs were appointed. To-day, the Marāthās have penetrated into the very bones and fibre of the body politic, and their power has increased beyond all bounds". (J.R., Misc. Papers, vol. v. No. 485, 59-61).

live amicably with the Marāthās by judicious compromise, and going to war only as a last resort.<sup>56</sup>

The Marāthā wakil, Dadu Bhimsen, gave a sanad on behalf of Shāhū, under-taking to fulfill Jai Singh's terms. "Even if five to six lakhs are realised from the jāgīr this year, it is acceptable" he wrote. "In three or four years it should give about ten lakhs".<sup>57</sup> For settling further details, Jai Singh sent Dip Singh as his envoy to Shāhū. Dip Singh concluded a pact promising 11 lakhs for Malwa and 15 lakhs for Gujarāt in lieu of chauth. Further, it was stipulated that the Marāthā troops would not cross the Narmada.<sup>58</sup>

At the court, the Emperor, never long of one mind, wrote "agreed" on Jai Singh's memorandum. Then he changed his mind, and charging Jai Singh with "negligence and sloth", removed him from the Governorship of Malwa, and appointed M. Khān Bangash in his place. The latter was ordered to march post-haste to the Narmada, and to drive out the Marāthās from Malwa.<sup>59</sup>

Thus, the policy urged by Jai Singh was not given a trial at all.<sup>60</sup>

56 In his dying will, Nizām-ul-Mulk wrote "..... it behoves the ruler of the Deccan, in his dealings with the Marāthās, who are the zamindars of this country, to seek peace and agreement with them. But he should maintain pre-eminently the dignity and prestige of Islam, and never allow them to overstep the bounds....." (Quoted in Āṣaf Jāh, 285).

The policy of Jai Singh may have been inspired by Nizām-ul-Mulk himself. Cf. R. Sinh, Malwa, 194-5.

57 J.R. Add. Pers. Vol. ii No. 96, d. 19 Sha'bān, Yr. 12|9 March, 1730. Repeated as No. 218 d. 12 Rabī' I Yr. 14 (Yr. 12?)|15 September 1732.

58 S.P.D. x 66, 67, 31, 71, 74, 73. Dip Singh went to pay a visit to the Nizam, after he had concluded the agreement, and told him that the visit had been undertaken at the Emperor's orders. Sardesai (Life of Baji Rao, 149) thinks that Jai Singh's object was to establish peace between the Emperor, the Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk. But the latter was then intent on his scheme of putting down Baji Rao with the help of a coalition consisting of the Dābhāde, the Senapati and others. He told Dip Singh, "I place absolutely no trust in the promises of the Marāthās.... or of Baji Rao as an individual. I do not trust him for a courier". (S.P.D. x 66).

59 Khujastah 347-8, J.A.S.B. 1878, 309.

60 Dighe, (Baji Rao, 120) declares "The policy of appeasement had been tried with disastrous results". But what had really produced disaster was

For some time after the downfall of the Saiyids, the house of Jodhpur was under a cloud. Two campaigns were undertaken against Ajit Singh between 1720 and 1724, as has been noted already.<sup>61</sup> Ajit Singh was pardoned and restored to manṣab in 1724. Soon after this, he was murdered by his son Bakht Singh,<sup>62</sup> and was succeeded by his second son, Abhai Singh.

Abhai Singh lived quietly at Jodhpur between 1724 and 1730 when he was appointed as the governor of Gujarāt in place of Sarbuland Khan.<sup>64</sup> Abhai Singh perceived at once that he could not resist the Marāthā claim for chauth with his limited resources. Hence, in April, 1730, he confirmed the grant of chauth to Baji Rao, and tried to befriend him in order to expel with his help the other Marāthā sardars like Kanthāji Kadam and Pilāji Gaekwad from Gujarat.<sup>65</sup> This was followed by a meeting with Baji Rao in February, 1731. In return for 13 lakhs as chauth, the latter promised to oust Kanthāji Kadam and Pilāji from Gujarāt.<sup>66</sup> Abhai Singh protested vehemently to the Court against Khān-i-Daurān's policy of reliance on Nizām-ul-Mulk and fighting Baji Rao with his help. "Nizām-ul-Mulk has sent Baji Rao the original of the Emperor's orders communicated to him, M. Khān Bangash and ourselves, in order to convince Baji Rao that in fighting Nizām-ul-Mulk he was fighting his own man and weakening his own side", he complained. Abhai Singh thought it a great stroke not a policy of so-called appeasement, but of half-hearted resistance and refusing to follow either the peace policy advocated by Jai Singh, or the policy of united resistance urged by M. Khān Bangash and some others.

<sup>61</sup> See 179-82 above.

<sup>62</sup> J.R., T. Muṣ. 337, Kāmwar, T. Hindī 497, Irvine ii 117-18. T. Muṣ. thinks that Ajit was murdered at the instance of the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, who hinted that the sins of Ajit Singh were too many to be forgotten. According to Kāmwar, the assassination was due to Ajit Singh's incestuous relations with his daughter-in-law, the wife of Bakht Singh.

<sup>64</sup> This appointment is ascribed to the influence of Khān-i-Daurān who wanted to detach Abhai Singh from the 'Tūrānī' party. (Āshūb 371, Mirāt ii 115, Siyar 462). Sarbuland's policy of granting chauth was not approved by the court at the time.

<sup>65</sup> S.P.D. xv 82.

<sup>66</sup> Mirāt ii 133-35, Surat Factory Records 614.

of policy on his part to have befriended Baji Rao and pitted him against Nizām-ul-Mulk. He claimed that he was thus serving the Emperor's cause.<sup>67</sup> But Abhai Singh was soon to be disillusioned. The Peshwa rendered him no help once he had defeated his rival, the Senapati Dābhāde, at Dabhoi in 1731. The Gaekwads continued to encroach on Gujarāt. In 1732, Abhai Singh treacherously murdered Pilāji, and seized Baroda. But he failed to gain any lasting advantage, and after losing Baroda in 1734, retired to Delhi where he joined hands with the party led by the wazīr Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān in urging armed resistance to the Marāthās.<sup>68</sup>

Thus, a sharp divergence came to exist between the attitudes of Jai Singh and Abhai Singh towards the Marāthās. This shows that religious considerations played little role in determining the relations of individual Rājput Rajas with the Marāthās.

Unlike both the Kachhwahas and the Rathors, the Bundelas rendered active assistance to the Marāthās from 1728 when Chhatrasāl summoned their help to repel an invasion by M. Khān Bangash, the governor of Allahabad. The Bundela chief agreed to pay an annual tribute of Rs. 65,000 which was converted into a jāgīr for the Peshwa after Chhatrasāl's death in 1731.<sup>69</sup> In 1733,

The Bundelas

<sup>67</sup> Abhai Singh's letter d. 14 Sudi Chait 1787 (Shrāwanūdi) | 10 April, 1731, quoted by V. Reu in I.H.R.C. Proc. 1939, 112-14.

Nizām-ul-Mulk complained to M. Khān Bangash that Abhai Singh was trying to befriend Baji Rao (Khujustah 331). The Emperor's instructions to the governors of Malwa and Gujarāt evidently were to co-operate with the Nizam, for the latter wrote thanking the Emperor for his orders. (Gulshan-i-Ajā'ib, quoted in Aṣaf Jūh 198).

V.V. 847 has got the facts all wrong. It asserts that Baji Rao came and besieged Baroda, and that the Nizam came upto Surat to help Abhai Singh who wrote him a letter of thanks.

<sup>68</sup> Mirāt ii 120-50, Letters of Abhai, cited by Reu in I.H.R.C. Proc. 1938, 1939, 1942. But Abhai Singh took no active part in the campaigns. According to Ghulām Husain, "he retired to his country where he devoted himself to the intoxication of opium. He slept the whole day and spent the whole night in asking what was to be done; yet whenever he was sent for by Khān-i-Daurān, he used to expulgate himself by alleging the necessity of defending his own hereditary dominions and by bringing forward such futile excuses". (Siyar 474).

<sup>69</sup> S.P.D. xii 34, xxx 288.

the former defensive agreement was supplemented by an agreement for offensive action. It was agreed that the Bundelas would join the Peshwa's standard and give him aid when he invaded foreign territory or marched on Delhi. Chhatrasāl's son, Hirdesa, with his eye on Orchha, dreamt of extending his territory in that direction, and the Peshwa promised to share the state with him half and half.<sup>70</sup>

Thus, the fear of the Imperial governor of Allahabad and desire to aggrandise themselves at the cost of their neighbours and the Empire threw the Bundelas into a partnership with the Marāthās. Consequently, the Marāthās acquired a very useful base for striking at the vital Dū'āb area which formed a part of the dominions of Sa'adat Khān. From the Dū'āb, the Marāthās could strike eastwards into Bihar and Bengal, or march on Delhi.

The establishment of the Marāthās in Bundelkhand brought the Marāthā danger to the door steps of Sa'adat Khān. Ever since his appointment to Awadh, in 1722, Sa'adat Khān had been consolidating his position there by subduing the local zamindars, and extending his dominions towards the line of the Jamuna in the south, and eastwards towards Bihar.<sup>71</sup> His interests thus clashed with those of Jai Singh and M. Khān Bangash both of whom had their eyes on the rich Dū'āb lands. This made cooperation between them, even against the Marāthās, extremely difficult. The jealousy between M. Khān Bangash and Sa'adat Khān was of old standing. The latter had refused to help when M. Khān was besieged by the Marāthās at Jaitpur in 1728.<sup>72</sup>

Sa'adat Khān seems to have remained away from the court for most of the time till 1733, when the growing threat of the Marāthās to Dū'āb brought him to Delhi. He then urged a policy of determined resistance to their growing encroachments.

M. Khān Bangash was a typical Afghan adventurer. In gratitude for his help against Jahāndār Shah, Farrukh Siyar granted him a tract of land around modern Farrukhabad. Soon, M. Khān Bangash converted Farrukhabad into a centre of Afghan power. After the assassination of Ḥusain 'Alī, he rose to the rank of 6,000, and then of 7,000. He was appointed the ṣūbahdār of Allahabad<sup>73</sup> in 1722, and remained in charge of that province till 1729. His constant preoccupation during this period was to chastise the Bundelas who had seized many royal lands on the other side of the Jamuna, and had virtually confiscated all the jāgīrs of the Imperial manṣabdārs in Bundelkhand. In November 1726, he led a campaign against the Bundelas, with the results already noted.<sup>74</sup> It is said that Khān-i-Daurān prevented the Emperor from giving him any help by pointing to the danger that a successful Afghan general would present to the monarchy.<sup>75</sup>

<sup>70</sup> S.P.D. xiv 7-9, Br. Ch. 44, S.P.D. xxx 210-11.

<sup>71</sup> Thus, about 1728, he leased the sarkārs of Banaras, Jaunpur, Chunargarh and Ghazipur from one Murtaẓa' Khān. In 1735, he was given the faujdārī of Kora-Jahanbad, for the suppression of the zamindar Adārū. (First Two Nawabs, 49-50). Sa'adat Khān also intrigued constantly for the provinces of Agra and Allahabad. (Iqbāl 195-6, Khujastah 118-9).

<sup>72</sup> J.A.S.B. 1878, 297-300.

M. Khān Bangash warned Jai Singh about the seriousness of the Marāthā danger, and the real nature of their ambitions. He wrote, "The Marāthās are deceitful and would overthrow him and the Bundelas after they have established themselves in their country." The only way, he suggested, was that "the Maharaja Dhiraj (Jai Singh) who had jāgīrs worth crores, and lakhs of men, should join hands with other nobles and pay attention to the task (of driving out the Marāthās)—though he had sufficient means of his own not to depend on any one. The Emperor himself should come to Agra. If this was done the mere handful of Marāthās could easily be checked and driven across the Narmada". M. Khān Bangash also warned Jai Singh of the danger of the Marāthā-Bundela combine, adding that "if they once take Agra, their boldness would increase beyond all bounds".<sup>76</sup>

After the departure of Nizām-ul-Mulk for the Deccan, two almost equally balanced groups emerged among the nobles at the Court. One of these was led by the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, and the other by the Chief Bakhshī, Khān-i-Daurān.

<sup>73</sup> Āshūb i 558, J.A.S.B. 1878, 283; Iqbāl 162.

<sup>74</sup> See 187, 199 above.

<sup>75</sup> Wārid 24, Iqbāl 168. Chhatrasāl had opened peace negotiations with M. Khān, and his sons had become so friendly with the Khan that a rumour had gained currency that an Afghan-Bundela pact had been formed.

<sup>76</sup> Khujastah 281, 288, 208.

Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān was the son of M. Amīn Khān. He has been described as "a munificent friend, a bountiful patron, and an enemy of oppression." We are told that he perceived the dangers facing the Empire better than any of his contemporaries. But he was a weak wazīr, wanting in activity and firmness, and rather too fond of pleasure. He was so negligent of business that he never attended any consultations, and sometimes absented himself from the court for long periods.<sup>77</sup> He had the complete trust and confidence of the Emperor. Like his father, he, also, was a great patron of the Mughals, and it is said that he employed only Mughals and Turks in his service.<sup>78</sup>

The leader of the second group was Bakhshī-ul-Mamālik Khān-i-Daurān. He has been described as "a learned man, and fond of the company of the learned." His character in personal life was above reproach, and he was not personally corrupt or intent on private gain,<sup>79</sup> which was more than could be said of most of his contemporaries, for bribery was openly rampant in the court at the time under the guise of presents (peshkash), and even the Emperor was said to share in it. Nor was Khān-i-Daurān wanting in understanding and loyalty to the ruling dynasty and the Empire. He did not attempt to carve out a semi-independent principality for himself like many others. But he lacked the tenacity of purpose necessary for the fulfilment of any coherent policy in a faction-ridden court, and possessed little military capacity which made him shrink from war and place an excessive reliance on diplomacy.<sup>80</sup>

<sup>77</sup> Hikāyat (A.S.B. Ms.), Iqbāl 215, M.U. 381, Siyar 870.

<sup>78</sup> Āshūb i 230, 558, 562, ii 102.

<sup>79</sup> Khazīnah-i-Āmirah 246, M.U. i 836. Thus, when Ja'far Khān, the shūbahdār of Bengal, died and was succeeded by his son, Shuja'-ud-Daulah, the latter sent besides peshkash a large sum of money for Khān-i-Daurān. But the latter deposited this sum along with the peshkash in the Imperial Treasury.

In a letter to M. Khān Bangash in 1731, Khan-i-Dauran set forth his incorruptibility with great vehemence, and asserted that apart from an increment of one crore dams he had not gained any additional jāgīrs since the accession of M. Shāh, or made any money out of transfers (Khujastah 255-6).

<sup>80</sup> Siyar 464 says, "Khān-i-Daurān, having fancied to himself that the evils

After the downfall of the Saiyids, Khān-i-Daurān was looked upon as the leader of the Hindustanis. Though his grand-father, Khwājah 'Abd'ul Mun'im had come to India from Bukhārā (Tūrān) at about the same time as Qamar-ud-Dīn's grand-uncle, 'Ālam Shaikh, the saintly life and calling of Khān-i-Daurān's family and his own co-mingling with ordinary soldiers early in his life had made him adopt the Indian manner of dress. He could not even speak Persian properly<sup>81</sup> He had been loosely allied with the Rājput chieftain, Jai Singh, since 1715 and it was at his instance that Ajit Singh was pardoned and restored to the ṣūbahdārī of Ajmer after the downfall of the Saiyids.<sup>82</sup> It is said that he employed only Hindustanis as soldiers. He was liberal in matters of faith: we are told that he practised yoga, and had attained considerable skill in holding breath (ḥasb-i-dam).<sup>83</sup> that were undermining the Empire of Hindustan could be remedied by dint of policy, and lost countries recovered by art and cunning, expected to bring everything into order by a knack at negotiations and by tricks of leger de main... But in general, this minister was exceedingly unlucky. Every scheme which he projected turned out to the detriment and dishonour of the Empire."

Āshūb (250) says that "the Amīr was clever, gifted with judgement and discretion. He had dignity and maintained prestige, and he was endowed with charming manners and just feelings, and was a good commander... (though) he never even took the muster of his soldiers... Excepting two defects, he was accomplished in all respects: he was very showy and proud of his parts but internally he was petty, and once the name of war reached him he would tremble...."

"Secondly, his consideration for the infidel...."

81 Risālah-i-Khān-i-Daurān (I.O.L. Ms.), Imād 35, Khazīnah 246, Yahyā 119b, Āshūb 72.

Khān-i-Daurān was descended from a famous family of Naqshbandīs. His ancestor, Khān Bahā-ud-Dīn, had been the Pīr and Murshid of all Tūrān and Turkistan (Āshūb 253). Khān-i-Daurān was one of five brothers, he and Muẓaffar Khān being from one mother, and the other three brothers from another.

82 K.K. 938, Siyar 453, T. Muḡ. 320.

83 Āshūb 250, Siwānīh-i-Khushgū (O.P.L. Ms.) f. 140a-141b. His brother, Khān Ja'far, the holy man, was suspected of Imāmīte tendencies (M.M. 53a-64a).

Apart from these two leading nobles and their followers, there was a third group consisting of the personal favourites of the Emperor, led by a woman of talent, Kūkī Jiū,<sup>84</sup> and the holy man, 'Abd'ul Ghafūr.<sup>85</sup> The part played by these two in bringing about the departure of Nizām-ul-Mulk from the court has been already noted. Both Kūkī Jiū and Shāh 'Abd'ul Ghafūr continued to exercise considerable influence after the departure of Nizām-ul-Mulk. 'Abd'ul Ghafūr, in particular, was said to be so influential that the Emperor would do nothing in opposition to his wishes.<sup>86</sup> He interfered particularly in the revenue department. Neither Kūkī nor 'Abd'ul Ghafūr held any important posts, or high rank in the hierarchy of nobles. 'Abd'ul Ghafūr's influence seems to have rested largely on the superstitious

84 Daughter of a geomancer, Jān M. Khān, who came into favour as result of some successful prophesies about Muḥammad Shāh. She was found useful by the Queen Mother in carrying messages to and fro. To give her a status, and facility of ingress and egress, it was given out that she was the foster-sister (dū-gānā) of the Emperor (Wārid 44, Āshūb 161). It is doubtful if she ever became the mistress of the Emperor, but she enjoyed great influence with him. K.K. (ii 940) calls her "a woman of great charm and intelligence."

Four of her brothers held the rank of 5000, and various other posts at the court. (Āshūb 165-8, T. Muḥ. 351).

85 It is said that he was a cotton-weaver. He claimed to know all sciences, and to control jins and spirits, and to see into the future. According to Shiv Das (150), he was an obscure faqīr in Bahādur Shāh's time, and was presented to Farrukh Siyar by M. Amīn, and granted an allowance of Rs. 500/- per month, and Sadarpur and Rohtas in al-tamghah. He took part in the conspiracy against Husain 'Alī, carrying messages to and from the palace, dressed as a milk-maid. He considered himself responsible for the downfall of the Saiyids and presumed accordingly (Āshūb 229). During the wizārat of Nizām-ul-Mulk, his power was so great that we are told revenue and administrative matters came to him before they came to Nizam (Iqbāl 150). Nizām-ul-Mulk did not like this interference, but maintained outward good relations with him, due to his past connections with M. Amīn who had paid great deference to him (Āshūb 229). After becoming the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn kept good relations with him, and the latter, posing as a friend, used to carry letters between him and the Emperor. (Iqbāl 150 Āshūb 229, Wārid 58-71, T. Muḥ. 350).

86 Wārid 60.

belief of the Emperor and his Mother in his magical powers and ability to gleam into the future. The primary object of Kūkī and 'Abd'ul Ghafūr appears to have been personal enrichment. Since they enjoyed the confidence of the Emperor, they were approached by governors and other needy people even from far off places like Bengal, Thatta and Kashmīr. In return for their intercession with the Emperor they received suitable presents, part of which found their way into the Imperial treasury by way of peshkash. Thus, the Emperor was satisfied, while the two amassed a fortune of lakhs and crores.<sup>87</sup>

Two other personages were allied with Kūkī's gang from the very beginning: these were Khwājah Khidmatgār Khān, the Nāzir-i-Haram,<sup>88</sup> and Roshan-ud-Daulah Zāfar Khān Pānīpatī, the third Bakhshī. Both were old employees of the state. Khwājah Khidmātgar had been trained under Aurangzīb and gave an impression of ability. It is said that he was averse to bribery and hence fell out with Kūkī Jiū.<sup>88a</sup> Roshan-ud-Daulah was a supple courtier and had been associated with every group since 1713.<sup>89</sup> Like Khān-i-Daurān, Zāfar Khān considered himself to be a Hindustani, and employed Indian Afghans in his contingent.

87 Āshūb 170-2, 159, 228, Qāsim 381-2 (Sarkar's Ms.).

88 His real name was Kh. Ambar. He had received training under Aurangzīb which gave him a superficial gloss of efficiency. He was in charge of all house-hold affairs since the last days of Aurangzīb. In the early years of Muḥammad Shāh, he received the rank of 5,000|5,000 through Kūkī (Wārid 44. Āshūb 158 says 6,000|6,000), and a fringed palki—a distinction which till Bahādur Shāh's time, had been reserved for the Princes.

88a Wārid 47.

89 A Tūrānī who had long been settled in Panipat. His grand-father, Khān Nāṣir, had come to India in the time of Shah Jahan and got a manṣab through Shuja'. (M.U. ii 533, Ashūb 57b, Wārid 29, Irvine ii 258). One of his brothers, Fakhr-ud-Daulah, was for long the governor of Bihar, and subsequently, of Gujarāt which he attempted vainly to recover from the Marāthās. He had the reputation of being a brave officer. (Āshūb 193). Roshan-ud-Daulah had been found on every side during the wizārat of the Saiyids. He was related by marriage to Sher Afkan Khān, and, in 1730-1, also contracted a marriage alliance with Nizām-ul-Mulk, by marrying his daughter to the latter's son, Nāṣir Khān (T. Muṣ. 329). It is said that

[continued]

The gang of favourites was not identified with any particular policy or group of nobles at the court. Hence, its political importance should not be over-rated. The influence of the favourites was erratic and fitful. They hindered the pursuance of any coherent state policy, and sometimes caused great resentment and annoyance to the ministers. Khān-i-Daurān openly inveighed against them on more than one occasion,<sup>90</sup> and it was due partly to his intrigues in conjunction with Sa'adat Khān that 'Abd'ul Ghafūr and Kūkī Jiū fell from power in 1732-33.<sup>91</sup>

Thus, during the early phase of the Marāthā advance into Malwa and Gujarāt, the court and the leading nobles were paralysed by internal divisions, and by the domination of worthless favourites.

Khān-i-Daurān's policy was essentially one of balance of power. He desired that no noble or provincial governor should be allowed to become so strong as to create the danger of his establishing a personal domination, as had been done by the Saiyids and by M. Amīn Khān, and was apparently the aim of Nizām-ul-Mulk. In particular, it implied that Nizām-ul-Mulk, who was regarded as the source of all evil, should be carefully check-mated—if necessary, with the help of the Marāthās.

this made Muḥammad Shāh suspicious of him and his downfall began from that date.

Āshūb gives extravagant descriptions of his wealth. He dressed in gorgeous clothes of silver. Even his elephants and horses carried 'amārīs and chains and saddles and trappings etc. all made of silver. Similarly, in his house, curtains and floors, the mekh and tanā, the walls and ceiling from the naqqārah-khānah to the diwān-khānah and his masnad were full of rows upon rows of silver. Whenever he passed through the bazars, he scattered bag-fulls of silver, and all business came to a standstill (Āshūb 170-2).

<sup>90</sup> Āshūb 190.

<sup>91</sup> Most contemporary histories give lengthy details of the fall of these favourites (Wārid 60-70, Iqbāl 175-80. Āshūb 225-48). The charge against all the three, 'Abd'ul Ghafūr, Kūkī Jiū and Roshan-ud-Daulah was misappropriation of money, which were brought to the Emperor's notice either by chance or by the contrivances of Khān-i-Daurān and Sa'adat Khān. Kh. Khidmatgār died in 1732; 'Abd'ul Ghafūr was sent to the fort of Gwalior where he died. Roshan-ud-Daulah continued to be in disgrace for some time, but was rehabilitated through Khān-i-Daurān to whom he is alleged to have paid a bribe of one crore in cash (Āshūb 190).

In pursuance of this policy, Khān-i-Daurān had refused to give any help to M. Khān Bangash against the Bundelas in 1728 by playing upon the fears of Muḥammad Shāh that a successful Afghan general would constitute a grave threat to the Timurid monarchy.

Again, in 1725, Khān-i-Daurān strove to bring about an alliance of Jai Singh Sawai and Kanhoji Bhonsle to counteract the alliance of Nizām-ul-Mulk and Baji Rao. Sarbuland Khān, Saif-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, Saiyid Ḥusain Khān the Governor of Ajmer, and a number of other nobles including the ṣūbahdār of Malwa were asked to help Jai Singh. A sum of fifty lakhs was allotted for the campaign from the royal treasury. Kanhoji Bhonsle, who had earlier helped Mubārīz Khān against Nizām-ul-Mulk, deputed his brother Santaji Sawai to meet Jai Singh on the Narmada with 25,000 horse and 25,000 foot, and stated that Raja Sultanji Nimbalkar would join with 50,000 foot and 50,000 jazā'il as soon as a noble was appointed from the court. He even hinted that Shāhū was friendly.<sup>92</sup>

But the campaign never came off due to the luke-warm support of Jai Singh who had already established friendly contacts with the Marāthās, and disregarded the appeal of Khān-i-Daurān to come to the court "if only for a day."

It may be surmised that the Court was not sorry to see Nizām-ul-Mulk and Baji Rao fall out among themselves subsequently. The Court hoped that this would give the Empire a respite from Marāthā incursions. However, when Nizām-ul-Mulk purchased a respite from the Marāthās at the cost of the Empire, the nobles loudly accused Nizām-ul-Mulk of treachery and collusion with the Marāthās. In October 1729, at the instance of Khān-i-Daurān, Jai Singh was appointed the Governor of Malwa and granted 13 lakhs of rupees to raise an army to drive out the Marāthās. He advocated peace with the Marāthās on certain conditions, as has been noted above. The Emperor agreed at first, then changed his mind, and appointed M. Khān Bangash as the Governor to implement a policy of stern resistance to the Marāthās.

Similarly, in Gujarāt, Sarbuland Khān, who had made a pact for chauth with the Marāthās, was replaced by Abhai Singh.<sup>92a</sup>

<sup>92</sup> J.R. (Add. Pers. Vol. ii 39, 40, 189, 118-2, v 92).

<sup>92a</sup> See 197, 202, 206 above.

The main reason for this sudden change of policy seems to have been the bombastic promises made by Nizām-ul-Mulk. He had been attempting, once again, to organise an anti-Baji Rao coalition with the aid of the Senapati and the Pratinidhi. For a sum of fifty lakhs from the court, he promised to clear the Marāthās from Malwa and Gujarāt.<sup>93</sup>

The offer of Nizām-ul-Mulk was not accepted as the Court continued to be deeply suspicious of his motives and actions. But M. Khān Bangash and Abhai Singh were ordered to co-operate with Nizām-ul-Mulk in resisting the Marāthās. M. Khān Bangash hurried to the Narmada, and for twelve days conferred with Nizām-ul-Mulk (about March 26 to April 7). It was agreed to concert measures against the "enemies of Islam", or rather, against Baji Rao and his party.<sup>94</sup> But the terms were not adhered to by M. Khān Bangash who attacked and razed to the ground the forts of Kākālī and Chikalatā belonging to Udāji Pawār who was said to be favourable to the anti-Baji Rao party.<sup>95</sup> Shortly afterwards, at Dabhoi, Baji Rao defeated Trimbakrao Dābhāde on whom Nizām-ul-Mulk had built his hopes of destroying Baji Rao.<sup>95a</sup> Nizām-ul-Mulk now changed sides and concluded a pact with Baji Rao, a secret clause in which is said to have left the latter free to pursue his own schemes in the North.<sup>96</sup> This was followed by a secret meeting between Nizām-ul-Mulk and Baji Rao at Rohe Rameshwar near the Moja river, near Ausa.<sup>97</sup>

93 Gulshan-i-Ajā'ib (Āṣaf Jāh 196).

In view of this, and the fact that M. Khān Bangash throughout kept the Emperor informed of his projected meeting with Nizām-ul-Mulk, it does not seem correct to regard the removal of M. Khān from the Governorship of Malwa in 1731 due to his alleged collusion with the Nizam (Cf. T. Hindī 516, Irvine, J.A.S.B. 1878, 328-334).

94 Khujastah 328-336, J.A.S.B. 1878, 311-3, Aḥwāl 199-200. See also Irvine ii 250-51.

95 Khujastah 17-20, J.A.S.B. 1878, 315-6.

95a See Dighe 38-39.

96 Khujastah 336-44.

97 S.P.D. xxx 90, 91, 104, 105, 6, 83, Vad i 55.

The dates of many of these papers are wrong. The meeting took place on Pausha Vandya, 7[20 Rajab]Wednesday 27 December 1732 (O.S., 6 January 1733 N.S.).

The effect of this volte face on Nizām-ul-Mulk's part was that the old suspicion between him and the court was revived, and any hopes of a joint front of the two against the Marāthās vanished for many years to come. The bitterness felt against Nizām-ul-Mulk may be gauged from the fact that in 1732, Sa'ādat Khān approached the Peshwa through the Bundela wakīl, and, on behalf of the Emperor, offered to accept the Peshwa's claim to nominate the ṣūbahdārs of the Deccan and Malwa, and such other minor claims as he might present. But in return he stipulated that Nizām-ul-Mulk must be "taken care of". To complete the negotiations, Sa'ādat Khān even offered to meet the Peshwa in Malwa or Orchha, whichever place was suitable.<sup>98</sup>

The full effects of the new pact between Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Peshwa were not long in being felt by the Mughals. In the campaigning season of 1731-2, the Marāthās invaded Malwa with more than 80,000 horse. M. Khān Bangash found his resources quite inadequate to the task of meeting this force, and sought a way out of his difficulties by forming a private pact with the Marāthās, agreeing to pay them one year's chauth for Malwa.<sup>99</sup> The principal demand for which the Marāthās had struggled for so long in Malwa was tacitly accepted by the Mughal Governor in this way.

Thus, towards the end of 1731 and the beginning of 1732, the Mughal-Marāthā relations in Malwa entered a new phase.

<sup>98</sup> S.P.D. xiii 9.

<sup>99</sup> Khujustah 139-40

CHAPTER IX

CONQUEST OF MALWA AND BUNDELKHAND (1732—42)

Soon after his verbal agreement with the Marāthās for the chauth of Malwa (1731), M. Khān Bangash was superseded as the governor of that province. Jai Singh Sawai was appointed in his place on condition that he maintained 30,000 horse and foot in equal numbers, two-third of the total income of the province from the land, tribute etc. being assigned to him for their expenses. But to impose a check upon him, it was stipulated that the dīwān of the province would maintain 18,000 horse and get one-third of the revenue which he was to collect through his own men. The Raja's deputy was to remain in the province for at least six months in the year during the Raja's absence.<sup>1</sup>

No governor had till then been given the resources which were placed at Jai Singh's disposal. He held the province of Agra in addition to Malwa, and could supplement the 48,000 horse and foot there by his own Jaipur contingent and the forces of the local Rajas who were appointed to his army. In addition to the revenues from Malwa, he received a sum of 20 lakhs from the Emperor—13 lakhs as grant, and 7 lakhs as loan.<sup>2</sup>

In view of the Raja's well known advocacy of a peaceful settlement with the Marāthās, it is hardly likely that he was appointed to Malwa to offer irreconcilable resistance to them. It rather seems that he was required to make a demonstration of strength before peace negotiations were undertaken.

Jai Singh reached Malwa in December, 1732. The Marāthās swept into the province under Holkar who soon hemmed in the forces of Jai Singh at Mandsaur. News of an intended march by the Emperor himself raised the spirits of the besieged who drove away Holkar 16 kos from Mandsaur. But the latter doubled back on his tracks, and Jaipur now lay open before him. In alarm, Jai Singh offered to make peace with the Marāthās. In March, 1733, he agreed to pay 6 lakhs in cash (as indemnity), and to assign to the Peshwa 28 parganas in Malwa in lieu of chauth.<sup>3</sup>

1 J.R., Aya Mal's Letter d. Asauj Badi 13, 1789|6 Sept. 1732. (Hindi Letters Vol. iii, Nos. 28-9, pp. 48-51).

2 Khujastah 314-5, Vamsh. 3212, Wārid 115-6.

This agreement marks a new stage in the Mughal-Marāthā struggle in Malwa. Hitherto, the Marāthās had been claiming chauth and sardeshmukhi, and urging its commutation into a lump annual sum or a jāgīr. Now, the ceding of certain parganas was demanded in lieu of chauth. Thus, all pretence of chauth being a payment in return for protection or refraining from plunder was dropped. The claim for chauth was revealed as merely an excuse for territorial aggrandizement. Henceforward, the demand for the chauth and sardeshmukhi of Malwa goes increasingly into the background, and the complete surrender of the province is demanded. Already, the Marāthās felt so secure in Malwa that in July 1732 the Peshwa divided the province among his chief captains Sindhia, Holkar and the two Pawār brothers.<sup>4</sup>

No confirmation of Jai Singh's agreement was forthcoming, and next year (1733-34), the Marāthās raided Rājputānā on the one hand, and on the other, laid contributions on the states of Datia, Orchha, etc. The Marāthā armies were joined by the sons of Chhatrasāl Bundela who had formed an agreement with Appa in 1733, by which they were to help the Marāthās, and to share their conquests across the Jumna.<sup>5</sup>

The ever-extending sweep of the Marāthā depredations at last awakened the court to a sense of real danger, and between 1732 and 1735, three campaigns were undertaken to drive the Marāthās out of Malwa. In 1732-3, the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, advanced upto the borders of Malwa with 80-90,000 men and camped in the Gwalior district at Sheopuri. He sent A'zīmullāh Khān to chase the Marāthās who had been keeping at a distance of 10-15 kos from the Imperial armies. A'zīmullāh caught up with Pilāji and, according to Shiv Das, inflicted a defeat upon him, forcing the Marāthās to re-cross the 3 S.P.D. xiv 2,7,9, xv 6, xxx pp. 310-11; V.V. ii 1218-20.

4 S.P.D. xxii 55, 82, R. Sinh, Malwa, 226.

5 S.P.D. xiv 10,13,18 (the correct date of xiv 13 is 9 Apr. 1734).

Narmada. Content with this victory, A'ẓīmullāh then rejoined the wazīr.<sup>6</sup> Meanwhile, the news of Jai Singh's defeat at Mandsaur was already known. No attempt was made to re-establish a defensive line on the Narmada in order to prevent future Marāthā incursions into Malwa. The Rajas of Orchha and Rao Ram Chandra pressed the wazīr to lead a campaign against the sons of Chhatrasal who were in league with the Marāthās, and to crush them. The Wazīr advanced upto the boundary of Raja Jagat Rai when he heard of a well-organised rebellion by a zamindar, Adaru, in his jāgīr in Ghazipur, and the death of his son-in-law, Niṣār Khān, at his hands. Greatly incensed, the Wazīr marched to that place and invested it. Shiv Das was an eye witness and has left a long account of the fight that followed. The defiance of the Imperial wazīr by a petty zamindar graphically illustrates the decline of Imperial power and prestige.<sup>6a</sup>

In 1733-34, the senseless proceeding of the previous year was repeated by Muẓaffar Khān, the brother of Khān-i-Daurān. Muẓaffar Khān advanced upto Sironj without encountering the Marāthās, and then returned without taking any steps for safeguarding Malwa from future Marāthā incursions.<sup>7</sup>

The climax of the Imperial efforts was reached in 1734-5 when two huge armies under the Wazīr Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, and the Bakhshī-ul-Mamālik Khān-i-Daurān respectively were got ready in order to drive the Marāthās beyond the Narmada. Khān-i-Daurān was joined by all the Rājput Rajas, including Jai Singh, Abhai Singh and Durjan Sal of Kotah. Holkar's raid into Rājputānā had opened their eyes, and in 6 Iqbāl 183-4. No other source mentions any conflict between the forces of the Wazīr and the Marāthās this year. According to the Marāthā sources, (S.P.D. xiv 9), the Marāthās had collected their dues and retired before the wazīr reached Malwa.

6a Iqbāl 194-6, S.P.D. xiv 9.

7 T. Hindī 525, Siyar 467, Irvine ii 279.

According to Āshūb (286-7), when Muẓaffar Khān reached Malwa, he dug trenches around his camp and waited for Malhar to attack. But Malhar refused to oblige him. Instead, he surrounded his camp and cut off his supplies. At length, with the approach of the rainy season, the Marāthās retired across the Narmada and Muẓaffar Khān returned to Delhi.

1734, at the instance of Jai Singh, the Rajas had met in a conference and taken a pledge of united resistance to the Marāthās.<sup>8</sup> The wazīr commanded a force of 25,000, and Khān-i-Daurān upward of 50,000 men.<sup>9</sup> But this mighty host found itself helpless once more in the face of the Marāthā light cavalry. Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh were surrounded and cut off at Toda Tank, and Jaipur lay defenceless before the Marāthās. At last, at the instance of Jai Singh, Khān-i-Daurān opened negotiations and agreed to give 22 lakhs annually to the Marāthās as the chauth of Malwa.<sup>10</sup> Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān had a light skirmish with Pilāji Jādv near Narwar, but he could not inflict any serious damage on the Marāthā forces.<sup>10a</sup>

These campaigns demonstrated once again the failure of the Mughals to find an answer to the Marāthā light cavalry tactics. This failure dated from the time of Malik Ambar and Shahji Bhonsle when Marāthā light-cavalry units had first made an organised appearance in the Deccan. Nor was an adequate answer to the Marāthā tactics to be found till the Rohillas adopted the quick-firing musket whose effectiveness was first demonstrated by Nādir Shāh at the battle of Panipat.<sup>11</sup> The Mughal armies, with their long baggage trains and heavy guns were more fit for positional warfare. Such a warfare, though presenting many difficulties, was still possible as long as the Marāthās had not crossed the line of the Narmada. With the final establishment of the Marāthās in south Malwa in 1732, the military problem for the

8 V.V. 1220-21.

9 S.P.D. xiv 22, 23. The Marāthā Wakil at Dhar, Naro Sheodeo estimated the combined forces of Jai Singh, Khān-i-Daurān and Abhai Singh at 2,00,000 horse and innumerable foot. Itihas Sangrah (Ait. Chariten, Letter 68). places the number at 50,000 which seems more probable.

10 S.P.D. xiv 23, 21, 29, 27, 24, 26, 57, xxii 284; T. Hindī 526-27. Irvine's account based on Āshūb is very confused. See Appendix "A". Qāsim (Sarkar Ms. 385) makes out that the Marāthās had attacked at the instance of Jai Singh himself. Jai Singh accused the Nizām of encouraging the Marāthās, and according to the author, persuaded Khān-i-Daurān to make peace with the Marāthās in order to prevent (recurring) Marāthā raids. Hence, 22 lakhs annually was granted, and Mahadeo Bhatt accompanied Khān-i-Daurān to Delhi.

10a T. Hindī 528-29.

11 See Sarkar, "Fall of the Mughal Empire", 30-31.

Imperialists changed entirely. They had now to fight a war of manoeuvre in the open plains where the Marāthā light cavalry was more formidable than ever, since it could hover round the Mughal armies outside the range of their heavy guns, and cut off their supplies and communications. Only after beating the Marāthās in a fight in the open plains could the Imperialists expel them from Malwa, and re-establish the line of the Narmada. The Mughals could devise no solution to this problem, and repeatedly found that the despatch of large armies against the Marāthās in Malwa failed to make any permanent impression on them, and left the Dū'āb and Rājputānā, and even Delhi dangerously exposed to Marāthā raids.

ii The "Peace" and the "War" Parties at the Court.

In the circumstances, two groups representing different policies came to the fore at the court. One group, led by Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh, urged peace with the Marāthās; the other, led by Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān and Sa'ādat Khān favoured continued warfare with still greater preparations, and securing the support of the Nizām for the purpose. M. Sarbuland Khān and Roshan-ud-Daulah supported the "War" party.<sup>12</sup>

Three years of campaigning had only led to the reaffirmation of Jai Singh's agreement of 1733 for chauth. Sa'ādat Khān charged Jai Singh with treachery and accused him of collusion with his co-religionists. "Jai Singh has ruined the Empire by his secret support to the Marāthās", he declared. "Give me only the governorship of Malwa and Agra. I do not ask for any monetary aid; Jai Singh may ask for crores but I do not need them. My treasury is full. The Nizām is my friend. He will hinder the Marāthās from crossing the Narmada".<sup>13</sup>

12 S.P.D. xx 134. Sarbuland Khān had been forbidden the court for 1,000 days after his unauthorised fight with Abhai Singh who had replaced him as the governor of Gujarāt. (Sa'ādat-i-Jāwid of Harnam Das, Elliot viii, 340). He was now back at the court.

13 S.P.D. xiv 47. M. Khān Bangash revealed, however, that Sa'ādat Khān had asked for four ṣūbahs and the post of Mir Bakshī. The Emperor was said to be willing to give two ṣūbahs and 2 crores. (S.P.D. xxx 134). Many other proposals were also made: that M. Khān should be given

[continued]

When the Emperor also joined in censuring Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh, Khān-i-Daurān replied, "The Marāthās cannot be effectually subdued by fighting. By friendly negotiations, I shall induce either the Peshwa or his brother to come and meet Your Majesty. If his demands are accepted, there will be no disturbance in the Imperial domains in the near future. If, on the other hand, Sa'adat Khān and the Nizām combine, they will set up another monarch".<sup>13a</sup>

Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh were obviously of the opinion that it was not possible to fight the Marāthās successfully and that a policy of reconciliation with them was the only feasible policy. They played upon the Emperor's fear that some of the powerful nobles might combine to set up a new monarch if they were placed at the head of large armies, and secured his consent for peace negotiations with the Marāthās. They also exploited the Emperor's deep-seated suspicion of Nizām-ul-Mulk's policies. In fact, it was difficult to follow the tortuous twists in the Nizām's policy, and to place any confidence in his assurances. He had befriended the Marāthās in 1725 and 1728, and betrayed them both times. In 1731, he had proposed a joint campaign against the Marāthās to M. Khān Bangash, and then concluded a treaty with Baji Rao in 1732. But, as before, he prepared to betray this treaty also. In 1735, he moved upto Burhanpur to support the wazīr's campaign in Malwa, sending 5000 horsemen to help him, and going so far as to ask Pilāji to withdraw.<sup>14</sup> All this was known at the court, but the Nizām was still not trusted.<sup>15</sup> Sa'adat Khān, who was in communication with him, also became suspect.

A long drawn out tussle ensued between the advocates of the two policies. At first, the Emperor inclined in favour of the "War" party. Abhai Singh was reconciled to the wazīr, and the Marāthā wakīl Agra or Malwa, and Sa'adat Khān Patna; or that M. Khan should get Allahabad. Sa'adat Khān himself was said to have offered a bribe of 15 lakhs to Khān-i-Daurān for being granted the ṣubāh of Allahabad (S.P.D. xiv 39-42, Khujastah 129-40).

<sup>13a</sup> S.P.D. xiv-47.

<sup>14</sup> B.I.S.M. Quarterly xii 4, Dighe 141.

<sup>15</sup> Cf. the remarks of Rustam 'Alī, "Nizām-ul-Mulk, with the utmost hostility towards Islām, always held out encouragement to infidels and tyrants." (T. Hindī 565).

reported that the Emperor proposed that Agra, Malwa and even Gujarāt should be given to Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, and two grand armies sent out. If Jai Singh did not join, his country was to be plundered and his disloyalty punished. The Emperor himself proposed to take the field as soon as the rivers became fordable. Jai Singh and Khān-i-Daurān were to be sent to the Deccan by way of Jaipur, while the wazīr, Abhai Singh and Sa'adat Khān would march by way of Gwalior.<sup>16</sup> M. Khān Bangash, then living in retirement at Farrukhabad, had also been approached, and by promises of jāgīrs and other favours, induced to raise an army to guard the Jamuna fords from the Marāthās.<sup>17</sup>

To check-mate the 'War' party, the Peshwa launched a diplomatic offensive in 1734-5. His mother went on a pilgrimage to Northern India. She visited the capitals of all the great Rajas, and the Marāthā wakīls utilised the opportunity to sound their opinions. Jai Singh was friendly, as also the Bundelas. The Maharaja of Udaipur was hesitant, while the attitude of Abhai Singh was uncertain. Jai Singh invited the Peshwa to Northern India, offering to bear his expenses which came to Rs. 5000 a day, and to secure for him the chauth of Malwa, and to introduce him to the Emperor (after assurances of safe custody) for the settlement of all his other claims.<sup>18</sup>

The action of Jai Singh in inviting Baji Rao to Northern India has been regarded as traitorous by many writers, and it has been imagined that Jai Singh proposed a joint expedition against Delhi.<sup>19</sup> It is clear, however, that Jai Singh invited Baji Rao on a peace mission, for he asked him to come at the head of 5000 horse only, telling the Marāthā wakīl that if the visit did not bear fruit, the Peshwa would be free to pursue any other methods he chose, i.e. war.<sup>20</sup> Thus, it was

<sup>16</sup> S.P.D. xiv 39.

<sup>17</sup> Khujastah 228-30, 233, 256-9, 283-4, J.A.S.B. 1878, 327-8.

<sup>18</sup> S.P.D. xiv 47, 51, xx 134.

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Sarkar ('Fall' 263-4) who, relying on the doubtful authority of Vamsh. (3239), declares that Jai Singh met Baji Rao at Bhambolao and told him that the time was not ripe for an invasion of Delhi. The Peshwa might come again next year, etc.

But S.P.D. do not support this interpretation.

<sup>20</sup> S.P.D. xiv 47. The actual terms proposed by Jai Singh through his agent were: a cash indemnity of twenty lakhs, a jāgīr of forty lakhs in Malwa

[continued]

a last desperate effort by Jai Singh to bring about peace before war was extended to the very heart of the Empire. Jai Singh apparently felt that if the Peshwa came to Northern India personally, it would be easier for him to arrive at a settlement with the Emperor than if he negotiated through intermediaries from Mahārāshtra.

Baji Rao's visit to North India in 1735-36 took place almost certainly with the knowledge, if not the consent of the Court, for the Imperialists undertook no campaigns against the Marāthās that year.<sup>21</sup> From January, 1736, as soon as the Peshwa crossed the Narmada, money for the expenses of the Marāthā army was received from the Court through Khān-i-Daurān.<sup>22</sup> The Peshwa left the Deccan in October, 1735. By the end of November, he had crossed the Tapti at Nandarbar, and in January, 1736, he reached Bānswārā on the border of Mewar. He reached Udaipur in the first week of February, and was met there by the dīwān and the agents of Raja Jai Singh. Peace envoys from the Imperial court also reached soon afterwards.<sup>23</sup> On March 14, Jai Singh had his first meeting with the Peshwa at Bhamolao, and remained with him for several days.<sup>24</sup> Jai Singh also had a personal motive in desiring a peace settlement with the Marāthās. He distrusted the "Mughals", and felt that the only way of safeguarding his position in Malwa was to buttress it with the friendship of the Peshwa. He keenly desired that the ṣūbahs of Malwa and Agra should (in lieu of chauth), and a tankhwāh on the territory of Dost M. Rohilla (S.P.D. xiv 50).

21 See Appendix 'A.'

22 S.P.D. xxx pp. 321-2. From February to April 1736, Rs. 1,07,500 were received 23 S.P.D. xxii p. 168, xiv 42, 50, xxx 141; Hingane Daftar No. 3, Dighe 124.

From Udaipur, Baji Rao wrote to his mother "The Delhi situation seems to be more hopeful. Nijābat 'Alī is coming with campaigning funds from Khān-i-Daurān and Aya Mal from Jai Singh. The chief thing is that the Emperor desires our friendship". (S.P.D. xiv 50).

24 S.P.D. xx pp. 322-4 leaves no doubt of this. The Peshwa remained with Jai Singh till 18th March. The date 8 Rabī 1/16 July, 1736 given by Irvine (ii 284) must, therefore, be rejected, as also the place of the meeting, Dholpur. There could have been no second meeting at Dholpur, for towards the end of May, the Peshwa left for the Deccan after having stayed in Malwa for two months. (S.P.D. xxii No. 333, Hingane Daftar 1, 2, 3).

be entrusted to him permanently.<sup>25</sup> He thus wanted to emulate Sa'adat Khān and Nizām-ul-Mulk in carving out a large territorial principality for himself.

iii The Peace Negotiations of 1736

From February to June, 1736, continuous negotiations took place between the Emperor and the Peshwa through Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh. It is not easy to follow the course of these complex negotiations which were carried on at three centres—Delhi, Jaipur, and the Peshwa's camp—through a host of intermediaries, and which ranged over a vast variety of topics. But all these long and complicated negotiations bore no fruit, due to the weak position of Jai Singh and Khān-i-Daurān at the court, the sustained opposition by the "War" party, the intrigues of the Nizām, and the Peshwa's extreme demands and his apparent unwillingness to come to the court personally and risk placing himself in the hands of the 'Mughals' (i.e. the 'War' party). The Marāthā wakīl warned Baji Rao. "All the Mughals are on one side, Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh and some (other) chiefs are on the other. It seems that Sa'adat Khān and Qamar-ud-Dīn will not let them carry through their decisions till they are defeated. The Mughals are untrustworthy, deceitful and faithless".<sup>26</sup> Baji Bhivrao also wrote, "In Delhi, the Mughals have made common cause. Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh are with the Emperor. The spies of Nizām come and go day and night. At the instance of Nizām-ul-Mulk, Qamar-ud-Dīn, Roshan-ud-Daulah, Sa'adat Khān and Abhai Singh have made common cause, and decided not to let you succeed. You cannot go to Delhi trusting in them. When Balaji, the heaven departed, had gone (to Delhi), the Saiyids were trustworthy and Shankarāji was the intermediary. The Mughals were completely powerless, and the Nizām was sitting in his house in retirement. To-day they are in their splendour, with their forces mustered strong".<sup>27</sup>

Baji Rao presented his demands through his wakīl, Dhondo

25 S.P.D. xiv 31, 47. He told the Marāthā wakīl. "If the Turanis win over the Deccanis they will ignore me. Hence, in all matters, I will follow the wishes of the Peshwa."

26 S.P.D. xiv 54.

27 S.P.D. xv 89, 91.

Mahadeo.<sup>28</sup> He asked for a hereditary state for himself under the crown, manṣabs and jāgīrs for himself and his chiefs,<sup>29</sup> cessation of hostilities against his army, an indemnity of 13 lakhs to meet the war expenses,<sup>30</sup> and 20 lakhs as chauth for the current year.<sup>31</sup> He also demanded the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa and control of its entire territories excluding the fort held directly by the Emperor, but including the lands of jāgīrdārs, old feudatories, grantees of rent-free lands and daily allowances, and the various zamindars who were to be maintained in their position only if they paid their dues to the Marāthās.<sup>32</sup> The Peshwa was also to have the right to levy tribute on the chiefs of Bundelkhand. But the most important demand of all was for the grant of the hereditary office of the sardeshpande of the Deccan to the Peshwa. The post was to carry with it five percent of the revenues of the Deccan, and also, it would seem, some undefined administrative functions.<sup>33</sup>

All these demands were accepted. Yādgar Khān who is described as the "key to Khān-i-Daurān's intelligence",<sup>34</sup> carried the royal patent granting the two provinces of Malwa and Gujarāt "which Baji Rao already held by the tenure of the sword", and also authority to levy dues from the Rajas of Bundelkhand.<sup>35</sup>

28 The demands presented by Baji Rao at different times are contained in separate yādīs or memoranda along with the reply. Since these yādīs are not dated, their order can only be fixed on grounds of internal evidence.

29 Notice how Baji Rao gradually edges out Shāhū and his family from sharing in the concessions granted by the Emperor. In 1730, the main demand had been for the grant of a jagir of 10 lakhs to Fateh Singh Bhonsle, the adopted son of Shāhū (See 204-5 above.)

30 This was to be paid in three instalments (S.P.D. xv 93). Later, in a separate yādī, 2 lakhs were demanded for Baji Rao's brother, Chimnaji (Ibid). Another yādī tells us that the Emperor agreed to pay 15 lakhs to Baji Rao before, during and after his visit to the court (S.P.D. xv pp. 94, 97). It would seem that this refers to the same demand for war expenses which had been previously agreed to.

31 T. Hindī 530.

32 S.P.D. xv pp. 92-3.

33 S.P.D. xv pp. 92, 95, 96. The Emperor agreed to this in return for a sum of 6 lakhs (Duff i 433).

34 Iqbāl 192.

35 S.P.D. xv p. 94, Siyar 468, 474. Duff (i. 432) says that Yādgar Khān, the

[continued]

Nevertheless, a final agreement could not be arrived at.<sup>36</sup> The main reason may be sought in certain far-reaching demands regarding the Deccan which Baji Rao made at this time. The Peshwa demanded a jāgīr of fifty lakhs in Khandesh, Aurangabad and Bijapur,<sup>37</sup> and the appointment of the crown-Prince as the Viceroy of the Deccan with himself (Baji Rao) as the Prince's deputy. All the administration was to be conducted through the latter, and any additional collections made in the Deccan were to be shared half and half.<sup>38</sup> envoy of Khān-i-Daurān, was sent from Delhi to negotiate with the Peshwa. He was secretly entrusted with sanads for the chauth and sardeshmukhi of Malwa, and authority to levy tribute amounting to Rs. 10,60,000 from the Rajput states beginning from Bundi and Kotah and extending upto Bhadawar. The object was to create ill-will between the Marāthās and the Rājput̃s. Yādgar̃ Khān had been instructed not to produce these terms unless absolutely necessary. Unfortunately for the Mughals, the Marāthā agent of Baji Rao discovered what had been done and informed his master. Baji Rao, convinced that the Emperor was at his mercy, raised his demands.

36 S.P.D. xx 134 says Rs. 20 lakhs in cash, and a jāgīr of 40 lakhs in Malwa and Bhopal in tankhwāh was agreed upon. Shiv Das (Iqbāl 193) says that Baji Rao was granted 7 lakhs rupees per year in tankhwāh upon the Deccan, which were to be given when he reached the court and swore fidelity.

The farmān granting the nā'ib-šūbahdārī of Malwa to Baji Rao was not issued till 29 September 1736 (xv 86. The English date given by the Editor is wrong). It was also rumoured that the Emperor had conferred the rank of 7000 on Baji Rao and of 5000 on Pilāji.

37 S.P.D. xv p. 95. In a separate Yādi (pp. 95-6), 50 lakhs were demanded from the Bengal treasury to help the Peshwa to pay off his debts. It is not clear if this was a new demand or a slight variation of the above demand. Dighe (128) thinks that this was a disguised demand for the chauth of Bengal. But the demand does not seem to have been for a recurring sum, as would be the case if chauth was demanded. At the time of the battle of Bhopal (1738), a subvention of 50 lakhs was again demanded from the Emperor, and agreed to by Nizām-ul-Mulk. (See 235 below).

38 S.P.D. xv 94-5. These demands are contained in two separate yādis, the first of which is addressed to Nizām-ul-Mulk. It is not clear when these demands were presented to Nizām. The Emperor's reply is not mentioned, but it may be presumed that they were rejected.

Thus, Baji Rao demanded the virtual ceding of the Deccan.<sup>39</sup> Other detailed demands about Malwa and Bundelkhand were also made in a separate yādī. These included the ejectment of Yār M. Khān from Bhopal, the handing over of the forts of Mandu, Dhar and Raisin, and the grant of the entire Malwa including the princely states as a jāgīr. The Peshwa also asked for the holy cities of Prayag, Benares, Gaya and Mathura in jāgīr. The Emperor agreed to eject Yār M. Khān but was willing to grant only one fort for the safe-keeping of Baji Rao's family when he came to visit the Emperor.<sup>40</sup>

These fresh demands placed the Emperor in a quandry. He was prepared to give the Peshwa the right of sardeshpande over the Deccan, and thus inflame hostility between him and the Nizām. But he was not prepared to hand over the entire Deccan to him. All this time, messages were being received by the Emperor from Nizām-ul-Mulk daily, asking him to stand firm, and offering help against the Marāthās.<sup>41</sup> Some lurking hope of saving Malwa and Gujarāt from the Marāthās may also have influenced the attitude of the Emperor who was never long of one mind. Anyhow, the demands of Baji Rao were exorbitant and threw the Emperor into the arms of the "War" party and Nizām-ul-Mulk. Baji Rao waited in Malwa in vain till the end of May for a reply to his demands, and then left for Mahārāshtra with the determination of getting all his demands accepted next year, or carrying the war into the heart of the Empire.<sup>42</sup> 39 The demand for the right to nominate the Mughal Viceroy of the Deccan was raised by the Marāthās as early as 1724 at the time of the negotiations with Mubārīz Khān. (S.P.D. x 1). The shubahdārī of Hyderabad and the ceding of several important forts had also been demanded. In 1733, the subject was reopened by Sa'adat Khān who offered to accept the Marāthā right to nominate the shubahdārs of the Deccan and Malwa, if they led a campaign against the Nizām (S.P.D. xxiii 9). Viewed against this background, the demands of 1736 regarding the Deccan are not surprising.

40 S.P.D. xv pp. 95-6.

41 S.P.D. v 89, 91, xxx 196.

42 S.P.D. xxii 33, Hingane Daftar 3-6. The Peshwa complained that at the time of Yādgar K.'s visit, it had been agreed that a reply to his demands would be sent within 20 days. He had waited in Malwa for two months, [continued]

Khān-i-Daurān was apparently keen that Baji Rao should visit the Emperor and join his service, and he asked him to come again early in the next campaigning season. He promised that at Ujjain the first instalment of the five lakhs promised as expenses would be paid to him, and that at Agra he would be met by Amīr Khān and Jai Singh, who would conduct him to Delhi where he would meet the Emperor during a ride (i.e. not in the court).<sup>43</sup> Jai Singh wrote expressing his friendship and requested the Peshwa not to march the Marāthā armies over his country and Bundi.<sup>44</sup>

iv The Marāthā Raid into the Dū'āb

Baji Rao was anxious not to annoy the Emperor or to damage his prestige,<sup>45</sup> far less to replace the Mughal Emperor by a Hindu or a Marāthā King. Although the Marāthās often talked of a Hindū-pad-pādshāhī, the Peshwas knew that they could not displace the Timurids from the throne and set up a Marāthā or even a Rājput prince in his place without uniting the rest of India against themselves.<sup>46</sup> Hence, the objective of the Peshwas was to leave the Timurids on the throne of Delhi, and to utilise their prestige and the halo of their name to spread Marāthā authority over the whole of India.

The immediate aims of Baji Rao, it would appear, were to secure the Emperor's recognition of the Marāthā conquest of Malwa and its neighbouring areas, and to completely dominate the Deccan with the Emperor's sanction. There were other sundry demands, too, which had been put forward in 1736. A notable demand was for the but no reply was forth-coming while he had been ruined by the expenses of maintaining an army (in camp).

43 S.P.D. xv pp. 94, 96, 87-9.

44 S.P.D. xxx 196.

45 Br. Ch. 27-Peshwa's letter to his brother Chimnaji. See H. N. Sinha, Rise of the Peshwas, 136-39, for an English translation.

46 The Marāthā Wakīl at Jaipur had sent a feeler in 1735, telling the Peshwa, "The Peshwa's power is so great that the time is suitable for the capture of the Delhi Empire and handing it over to the Chhatrapati". (S.P.D. xxx 134). This seems to have evoked no response from Baji Rao. Sardesai says, "The dream of Hindū-pad pādshāhī was not territorial ambition but mainly limited to the religious field". (New History of Marāthā People, ii 35).

grant of a large cash subsidy to enable the Peshwa to clear off his mounting debts. But these objectives could not be realised unless the "War" party at the court had been defeated or thoroughly cowed down. With this object in view, the Peshwa left the Deccan on the Dashera day in 1736, resolved to raid the Dū'āb and to show his invincible power to the Emperor.

By February 1737, the Peshwa had reached Agra. At Delhi, the "War" party had made grand preparations. Two armies were to be sent out under Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān and Khān-i-Daurān. Sa'adat Khān was to join at Agra, as also Abhai Singh. The combined army was then to proceed against the Marāthās. M. Khān Bangash had actually joined Khān-i-Daurān with 12,000 horse.<sup>47</sup>

The campaign began badly for the Peshwa. A raid into the Dū'āb by Holkar was repelled by Sa'adat Khān with serious losses to the Marāthās. Two royal armies were converging on Agra, and Baji Rao had to move fast. Deciding to make a bold stroke, he slipped past the approaching Mughal armies and suddenly appeared before Delhi. His object was not to damage the prestige of the Emperor or alienate him by sacking Delhi, but, as he himself says, "to expose the boast of the "Turanis" and to induce the Emperor to make peace". Hence, having made this demonstration of strength, and having held the Emperor at his mercy for three days, the Peshwa retreated.<sup>48</sup>

47 S.P.D. xxx 196, T. Hindī 539.

48 Br. Ch. 27. The Peshwa explained his conduct to Chimnaji thus: "I was resolved to let the Emperor know the truth, to prove that I was still in Hindusthan and to show him the Marāthās at the gates of the capital. . . . Khan Dauran and Bangash reached Agra and met Sadat Khan who had already reached there with his army. My wakil Dhondo Pant was with Khan Dauran. Sadat Khan sent him a message that Baji Rao's army had been dispersed; that he had fled beyond the Chambal, and it was no longer necessary to honour his envoy; he should be dismissed forthwith. Dhondo Pant was therefore sent away and arrived in my camp. . . . I now changed my plan of sacking the capital. I knew that the Emperor and Khan Dauran were inclined to grant my demands, but the Mughal faction was opposed to this conciliatory policy. I did not want to drive our friends to an extremity by committing sacrilege on the capital. I therefore sent letters assuring the Emperor. . . ."

Baji Rao succeeded in his objective of discrediting the "War" party. The Emperor was greatly incensed at Sa'adat Khān, arguing that it was his haste in precipitating a fight with Holkar which had brought about the Delhi raid. Sa'adat Khān's renewed offers to check the Marāthās if he was given Agra, Gujarāt, Malwa and Ajmer was brushed aside, and he was ordered to proceed to his charge without obtaining an audience with the Emperor.<sup>49</sup> But Baji Rao failed to induce the Emperor to make peace with him. His raid had inspired universal alarm. The Emperor was now more prepared to listen to the overtures of Nizām-ul-Mulk than to any peace offers, and farmāns were sent summoning the latter to the court.<sup>50</sup>

Thus, Baji Rao was once again brought face to face with his old enemy, the Nizām. Nothing could be decided till the issue between these two veterans had been settled, one way or the other.

v The Battle of Bhopal.

Nizām-ul-Mulk had been closely following the progress of the Marāthā armies in Northern India. He was desirous of evolving a 49 S.P.D. xv 29. T. Hindī 542. Āshūb 125a says that after the raid, Khān-i-Daurān induced the Emperor to grant Baji Rao the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa, and 13 lakhs in cash were also promised.

Qāsim 359 (Sarkar Ms.) says that after the raid the wazīr summoned Hingane for peace. The latter asked for the chauth of Malwa, Ujjain (Bundelkhand) and Gujarāt. Siyar also mentions that peace negotiations were opened.

On the other hand, the Marāthā Wakīl wrote that his effort to open peace negotiations through Jai Singh had failed. The Nizām was coming, everything would be settled on his arrival. (S.P.D. xv 33).

It is possible that exploratory talks were started, but broken off as soon as it became certain that the Nizām was coming.

50 S.P.D. xv 26, 23, 33, x 27. Nizām-ul-Mulk left for Delhi on 17 Zilhijjah 1177 April, 1737. The Marāthā wakīl wrote that he professed many friendly sentiments for Baji Rao, but his real intentions were different. "He thinks, 'If Baji Rao goes to Delhi and meets the Emperor, what will happen to me? A new subedar (of the Deccan) will be appointed.' For this reason he has written to all the nobles and the Emperor that he is coming. With the help of the Imperial treasure what difficulty can there be in beating the "robbers" (ghanīms)! Upon this, His Majesty put off meeting Baji Rao, and sent a nān (piece of bread) to the Nizām (by way of invitation)."

balance of power between the Marāthās and the Delhi Court, and was not averse to purchasing a respite for himself occasionally by conniving at Marāthā aggrandizement at the expense of the Empire. But Nizām-ul-Mulk had no wish to see the Marāthās establish a dominating position in the North. By 1735, the Marāthās had achieved such success that important areas of Northern India seemed likely to come under their sway. Nizām-ul-Mulk also felt uneasy at the negotiations of 1736, being afraid that the Emperor would try to buy off the Marāthās at his expense. His apprehensions were correct, for the terms of 1736 had included a Marāthā demand for the appointment of the Peshwa as the sar-deshpande and the deputy-viceroy of the six Deccan ṣūbahs. Hence, the Nizām came to Delhi with two purposes, first and foremost, to safeguard his position in the Deccan, and second, to prevent the Marāthās from establishing a dominating influence in Northern India and at the Court. He might also have hoped to utilise the opportunity to gain further advantages for himself. If he could defeat the Marāthās with the help of the Imperial armies, he would be the real arbiter of India.

Thus, the struggle between the Marāthās and Nizām-ul-Mulk now was virtually a struggle for the domination of India—both northern and southern. Baji Rao was aware of the issues at stake. For him it was even more a battle for the domination of the Deccan than of Northern India. "Let every Marāthā join", he wrote to his brother, Chimnaji, on the eve of the battle of Bhopal in 1736, "and one grand united push may make us masters of the Deccan." "If the Nawab (Nizām-ul-Mulk) is taken care of, the entire Deccan will be freed of danger", this phrase occurs repeatedly in his letters.<sup>51</sup>

Even before Nizām-ul-Mulk reached Delhi, he was substantively appointed the ṣūbahdār of Agra and Malwa on condition of driving out the Marāthās from there. It was reported that Allahabad, Gujarāt and Ajmer were also promised to his friends and nominees after the successful termination of the campaign against the Marāthās.<sup>52</sup> It was clear that the Emperor could no longer avoid being dominated by one or the other of the protagonists, unless something unexpected supervened.

<sup>51</sup> Br. Ch. 33-35, Riyasat 371-2 Thus, the view that by defeating Nizām at Phalkhed in 1727, Baji Rao gained the supremacy of the Deccan would seem to be unhistorical. (Cf. Dighe 20).

<sup>52</sup> S.P.D. xv 53.

Nizām-ul-Mulk reached Delhi on 12th July, 1737, and was royally received. In August, he was formally appointed the Governor of Malwa in place of Baji Rao, and after the rains were over, he advanced into Malwa, determined "to cure the Marāthā disease once for all". He had 30,000 troops and detachments from all the prominent chiefs of Rājputānā and Bundelkhand who had joined him willy-nilly.<sup>53</sup> The Peshwa encountered this with an army of 80,000 horse. The Nizām was hoping for reinforcements from Sa'adat Khān and from the Deccan. A contingent under Safdar Jang joined, but the Marāthās succeeded in preventing the Deccan troops from joining him. Under the circumstances, the Nizām's heavily armed and slow-moving troops were soon surrounded by the numerically superior Marāthās, and hemmed in at Bhopal. It was a repetition of the old tale of the slow-moving Imperial armies being unable to cope with the swift, lightly-armed Marāthā cavalry. The Nizām's plight was worsened by his suspicion of his Rājput allies.<sup>54</sup> He could neither move, except at a <sup>53</sup> S.P.D. x 27, xv 56-8, xxx 207. (The correct date of x 27 is 10 January 1737, and not 10 June, 1724). It is stated that the number of his troops swelled to 70,000, but the Peshwa in his letters places it at 35,000 (Br. Ch. 134). We are told that a contingent from Sa'adat Khān also joined at this time (xx 207). Irvine (ii 304), on the authority of Duff (i 397), states that the contingent under Safdar Jang was intercepted and defeated by Malhar Holkar and Jaswant Pawar. But S.P.D. (xxx 207) definitely states that the troops sent by Sa'adat joined on 24 December (N.S.).

<sup>54</sup> Y. H. Khān (Aṣaf Jāh, 123) states that Nizām-ul-Mulk could not take an offensive as "he found that the Rajputs and the Bundelas could not be trusted, in the event of a general action. They were in fact secretly sending information to the enemy as to his plans and intentions."

That the Nizām and the Rājputās were distrustful of each other is attested to by the Peshwa himself (Br. Ch. 33). But there is nothing to prove that the Rājputās were actually in secret collusion with the Marāthās. As a matter of fact, the Rājputās bore the brunt of the fighting which took place, losing several hundred killed. (Br. Ch. 33). The Peshwa, who gives a detailed account of the fighting in his letters to Chimnaji, makes no mention of any help or information received from the Rājputās. But when famine began in the camp of the Nizām, everyone thought of getting away, and many Rājputās did likewise. (Ibid).

[continued]

snail's pace, nor come out and fight, and his provisions were running low. On the other hand, the Marāthās could not storm his camp due to his superior artillery. Therefore negotiations were set afoot, and after much hard bargaining, on January 7, 1739, Nizām-ul-Mulk agreed to the following terms:

- (i) Grant of the ṣūbahdārī of Malwa, and the whole of it in jāgīr (to the Peshwa),
- (ii) Ceding of the complete sovereignty of the territory between the Narmada and the Chambal,
- (iii) The Nizām to obtain sands of confirmation from the Emperor for the above, and, further,
- (iv) to use every endeavour to procure the payment of fifty lakhs for war expenditure. The Nizām promised to pay according to his circumstances, if the Emperor did not agree to pay.<sup>55</sup>

Thus, by the treaty of Bhopal, Baji Rao obtained confirmation of the most important of his demands presented to the Emperor in 1736—except those relating to the Deccan. Malwa and Bundelkhand were practically ceded to him, and the 50 lakhs he had demanded from the Bengal treasury were to be paid by the Emperor from any source he liked. The Marāthās might have asked for more, but as Baji Rao wrote to Chimnaji, "Fortified as the Nizām was with strong artillery and with the Bundelas and Rajput Rajas as his staunch allies, I accepted

Y. H. Khān further states (214), "It is also quite probable that the Amīrū'l Umara Samsamū'd Daulah who was jealous of Nizām-ul-Mulk and desired his expedition against the Marāthās to fail, intrigued with the Rājapūts to thwart the Nizām in this manner."

The contemporary chroniclers, usually fertile in excuses, have not made any such suggestion. Rustam Ali (T. Hindī 549-50), hints that the Nizām himself was not serious about fighting the Marāthās. He observes:—"As the crooked mind of Nizām-ul-Mulk was bent towards such things as were contrary to what his name imports viz., administration, he allowed disturbances to break out in the country and with his eyes open suffered for one or two days grain to be sold in his camp at one seer for a rupee. On account of the tumults and quarrels raised by him, many people were hastened to their graves with the stroke of starvation, and many Musalmans, by the tricks of that unprincipled man, fell into the hand of the enemy, and met with their destruction."

<sup>55</sup> Br. Ch. 35, 36, S.P.D. xv, p. 87.

your advice and agreed to much lower terms than might have been exacted".<sup>56</sup>

After the defeat of the most powerful general in the Empire, it is more than probable that the Emperor would have resigned himself to the loss of Malwa and Bundelkhand and confirmed the agreement made by Nizām-ul-Mulk, especially as Jai Singh and Khān-i-Daurān had been urging such an agreement for a long time. It is not possible to visualise how the situation would have shaped after that. Baji Rao may have used Malwa as a base for advancing into the Dū'āb, or he might have maintained peace with the Emperor and concentrated on the realisation of his unfulfilled demands regarding the Deccan, i.e., the achievement of complete supremacy in the Deccan, including the transfer to him of the administration (nizāmat) of the provinces.<sup>57</sup> Sooner or later, the whole of India seemed destined to come under Marāthā domination.

This development was interrupted and given a new direction by the invasion of Nādir Shāh, which came as a bolt from the blue to most Indian observers, so used had they become to the safeguarding of the north-west passes by Mughal power.

For the Marāthās, the invasion of Nādir Shāh was an unpleasant intrusion by an outsider in a field which they had come to regard as their own. If Nādir Shāh was to stay in India and found a new dynasty subverting that of the Chaghtāis—and reports spoke of his having declared himself Emperor of India and of his intention of marching south—it would be a big blow against Marāthā ambitions, and their new conquests beyond the Narmada would be imperilled. In the circumstances, a

<sup>56</sup> Br. Ch. 35, 36.

<sup>57</sup> An extant paper sets out the following demands of Baji Rao which were presented to Nizām-ul-Mulk: cede Chandawar which formed part of the old swarajya of Shivaji; help Peshwa who is burdened with debt and give him a jāgīr worth 50 lakhs in Khandesh, Bijapur and Aurangabad; give the post of sardeshpanḍe carrying a hereditary charge of 5% on the revenue, the Deccan to be administered through the Peshwa; grant the fort of Shivner and certain villages in inām. (S.P.D. xv pp. 94-5). A verbal discussion is reported to have taken place.

It is not clear when these demands could have been made. The Peshwa's letters make no mention of these demands in 1736.

new approach became necessary. Shāhū instructed Baji Rao to hurry to the aid of the Emperor "in accordance with our undertaking to Aurangzeb that whenever the Empire was in any difficulty, we would help".<sup>58</sup> Prospects of a coalition of the forces of the Rājputs and the Bundela princes with those of the Peshwa began to be discussed.<sup>59</sup> Nāṣir Jang was written to. But the Maratha army was engaged in the siege of Bassein. Raghuji Bhonsle was engaged in his own projects; the Dābhāde was sulkily with-holding cooperation, and without a large army Baji Rao refused to move.<sup>60</sup>

While the Peshwa's troops were still engaged in the siege of Bassein, Nādir Shāh turned back towards Īrān. He contended himself by sending a threatening letter to Baji Rao, bidding him to be loyal to the Mughal Emperor else he would come back and punish him. Baji Rao replied in diplomatic terms and sent a nazr of 101 muhars.<sup>61</sup>

Nādir Shāh's invasion did no more than reveal the real weakness of the Mughal Empire to the whole world—the Marāthās had long been aware of it. But it brought home to the latter the danger of a foreign conquest of India. This called forth an interesting proposal from Baji Rao. He proposed that all the nobles, high and low, should join together with their armies in a kind of confederation as it were to reduce the affairs of the Timurid line to a better order, and to oppose "the enemy", i.e., the foreign invader.<sup>62</sup> M. Khān Bangash was one of the nobles to whom he broached this proposal. Baji Rao moved upto Malwa, and pretended that he had come to see the Emperor. He also informed M. Khān that Jadu Rai had been sent to the Emperor, and awaited the wazir's reply to his proposals to end the differences among the nobles.<sup>63</sup>

While the proposals of Baji Rao did not meet with any success,

58 S.P.D. xxx 222.

59 S.P.D. xv 75, 72, xx p. 385, Dighe 152.

60 Dighe 152.

61 Sardesai, Life of Baji Rao, 335.

62 Khujastah 376, 219, 244, J.A.S.B., 1878 333. Baji Rao wrote:—
 "Dar-ān waqt waqt ast ki hamān sardārān-i-nāmdār wa nawīsān-i-ṣāhib-i-iqtidār bah ijtīmā'-i-afwāj wa ittifaq i-ham-āgar pardākhtah musta'id wa mutawajjih barāti muqāwamat-i-mukhālif būshand."

63 Khujastah 375-6.

as was perhaps to be expected, they may be said to represent the beginning of a new political approach on the part of the Marāthās. Baji Rao, it would seem, had dimly begun to realise the need of enlisting the co-operation of the Emperor and his ministers and of the leading "powers" in north India to safeguard against the likely recurrence of foreign raids from the north-west. Carried to its logical conclusion, this new approach implied the establishment of a kind of a confederation under the over-all direction and control of the Peshwa, with considerable autonomy to the various "powers" constituting it, and the retention of the Timurid monarchy as a symbol of unity and a rallying centre in case of foreign danger.<sup>64</sup> Thus, a new equilibrium was sought to be created between the age long forces of unity and regional independence.

vi Final Ceding of Malwa and Bundelkhand

The invasion of Nādir Shāh resulted in far-reaching changes in the position and influence of the various groups at the Court. Sa'adat Khān, one of the pillars of the anti-Marāthā faction, died, while both Nizām-ul-Mulk and Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān were discredited in the eyes of Muḥammad Shāh. Nizām-ul-Mulk left the Court, and reached an understanding with the Marāthās again.<sup>65</sup> In the opposite faction, Khān-i-Daurān also was killed. This left Jai Singh Sawai as the most influential of the old nobles. At his instance, peace was made with the Marāthās in 1741. But this did not take place before the Emperor had made one last effort to recover Malwa and Gujarāt, and was faced with the renewed threat of invasion by the new Peshwa, Balaji Rao.<sup>66</sup>

The final terms negotiated with the Marāthās through Jai Singh were similar to those demanded by Baji Rao in 1736 and 1738. Malwa was ceded—though to save the prestige of the Emperor, the Peshwa was only granted the nā'ib-sūbahdārī of the province, an Imperial prince remaining the formal Governor. The grant to the Peshwa included 64 Cf. the remark of Shāhū to Balaji Rao after Baji Rao's death. "His (Baji Rao's) ambition was to guard the Mughal empire and at the same time to conquer all Hindustan." (Br. Ch. 117-20).

65 In 1740, the Nizām met the Peshwa in Malwa and secured Marāthā aid against his son, Nāṣir Jang, who had rebelled (S.P.D. xxi).

66 Rajwade vi 145, 149; S.P.D. xiii 4, R. Sinh, 'Malwa', 266-8, T. Muṣ. 320.

all faujdārīs, i.e., complete jurisdiction over the province including the states. The demand about the right of levying chauth on all states south of the Chambal seems also to have been accepted. In place of the cash demand of 50 lakhs by the Peshwa, the chauth of Bengal, Bihar and Orrissa was ceded to him. No agreement seems to have been made about the Deccan, however, perhaps because Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Peshwa were on good terms again. Fifteen lakhs in cash were to be given to the Peshwa in three instalments. In return, the Peshwa gave a written undertaking, (i) to visit the Emperor, (ii) to see that no Marāthās crossed the Narmada, holding himself responsible for the acts of any one who did cross; (iii) not to disturb any province except Malwa; (iv) not to ask in future for any money in addition to what was granted; (v) to depute one Marāthā general with 500 horse to serve the Emperor, and (vi) to join the Imperial army with a contingent of 4000 men whenever the Imperialists undertook a campaign—any additional help to be paid for.<sup>67</sup>

These terms might be said to constitute a tacit alliance between the Emperor and the Marāthās. The Marāthās were virtually left a free hand in the Deccan and, in return, promised not to molest the northern possessions of the Emperor and to render him aid in case of need, i.e. in case of renewed foreign danger. Henceforth, an accredited Marāthā representative, Mahadev Bhatt Hingane, lived at the Delhi court, and became a powerful factor in the Imperial politics.

The final ceding of Malwa and Bundelkhand to the Marāthās brings to an end a definite stage in Mughal-Marāthā relations, and marks the beginning of a new phase during which the Marāthās made a bid for supreme power in India, and closely influenced parties and politics at the court. However, a study of this phase lies out-side the scope of the present work.

<sup>67</sup> S.P.D. xv 86, pp. 97-8, Rajwade ii pp. 91-95. These papers should be dated in 1741 [S.P.D. x 186 should be 28 September 1741 (or 17 September old style), xv p. 97 July 15 (or 4 July o.s.)]

APPENDIX A

WAS THERE AN IMPERIAL CAMPAIGN IN THE YEAR 1735-36?

Irvine (ii 283-284) speaks of an Imperial campaign in the 18th year of Muḥammad Shāh's reign (1735-6) after which the Emperor accepted the proposal brought forward by Jai Singh that he should relinquish the government of Malwa in favour of Peshwa Baji Rao.

Sarkar ('Fall'ili 277-8) follows Irvine. Dr. Raghubir Sinh (Malwa p. 239, f.n. i) is doubtful if the campaign was continued after peace negotiations had begun in February 1736, but has left the issue undecided.

It is clear, however, that there could have been no campaign at all this year. The only authority which mentions the campaign is Āshūb. From internal and circumstantial evidence it is clear that Āshūb speaks, in fact, of the campaign of the 17th year (1734-35), but the details have been mixed up, either by the author himself or by some later copyist.

Āshūb speaks of two expeditions in the 18th year (1735-36), one of which was led by the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, and proceeding by way of Mewar, fought several skirmishes with Pilāji Gaikwad (Āshūb pp. 355-62). But this is impossible, as Pilāji was sick and did not come to North India at all that year. (S.P.D. xxii 306-9, pp. 168-70, Dighe f.n. 9, p. 123). This is followed by a detailed account of the fight of Jai Singh and Khān-i-Daurān against Malhar Holkar at Tal Katora (Āshūb pp. 363-74). This, again, refers to the campaign of the previous year, because (i) a similar campaign was fought at the same place in 1734-35, (ii) there is no mention in Āshūb's account of any activity by Baji Rao, who is mentioned as being busy in the Konkan, (iii) we are told that after concluding a pact for chauth with Jai Singh, Malhar Rao returned to the Deccan (Āshūb p. 374). But we know definitely that in April 1736 Malhar led a campaign into Marwar and remained camping at Malwa throughout the rains, (iv) In January, Hingane met Jai Singh at Jaipur (S.P.D. xiv 50), in February, Khān-i-Daurān was at Delhi (xiv 56), in March, Baji Rao, met Jai Singh (S.P.D. xxx pp. 322-4). If so, when could the campaign have taken place ?

Āshūb's dates relating to the Marāthā campaign are uncertain as he says (p. 249) that his papers got mixed up during a flood. The account of the 17th year (pp. 347-53, dated 1147 H., but wrongly placed under the 18th Regnal year) makes no mention of the activities of Qamar-ud-Dīn in Bundelkhand. The account relating to the activities of Khān-i-Daurān and Jai Singh also breaks off abruptly on page 363 (which is placed in the year 1148 H.).

It is clear that the accounts of Ashūb on pages 347-53 dated 1147 and on pages 355-75, dated 1148 refer to the campaign of the same year, i.e. 1147/1734-5.

There was, thus, no Imperial campaign in 1735-36.

CHAPTER X

MUGHAL POLITICS AND NĀDIR SHĀH

i The North-West and the Mughals.

The Great Mughals had kept a close and continuous watch on their North-West frontier which touched Īrān on the one hand, and the states of Tūrān on the other. In order to guard against the recurrent danger of invasion from these quarters, they had attempted:

(i) to prevent by diplomatic means the coming into being of a hostile combination of powers in West and Central Asia;

(ii) to maintain a strong administration in Kabul and to secure, if possible, Qandhār which was regarded as “the gate-way to Kabul”; and

(iii) to keep a contented population in Afghanistan and the tribal regions by providing economic assistance in various forms.

To implement this policy, some of the ablest nobles had been appointed as Governors of Kabul with large armies at their disposal. A considerable amount had been spent from the central exchequer towards the maintenance of these armies, meeting the cost of administration, and also by way of subsidy for pacifying the war-like tribal population. In spite of foreign intrigues, a constant tussle with Īrān over the possession of Qandhār, and occasional unrest among the tribesmen, the Mughal policy had been successful in keeping prospective invaders at a safe distance from the frontiers of India.

From 1677, the governor of Kabul was Amīr Khān, an extremely able noble who was greatly trusted by Aurangzīb. After his death in 1698, Shāh ‘Ālam was appointed as the governor, with Nāṣir Khān as his deputy.<sup>1</sup> In 1700, Shāh ‘Ālam was also appointed the governor of Lahore. The prince’s eldest son, Jahāndār Shāh, remained in charge of Multan. Thus, the responsibility for safe-guarding the North-West was placed in the hands of Prince Shāh 'Ālam. Aurangzīb himself kept the closest supervision over the affairs of these provinces,<sup>2</sup> while Shāh 'Ālam, by his constant marches and counter-marches, kept good order in the region, and prevented the rebel Prince Akbar, who had taken shelter in Īrān, from attempting an invasion.<sup>3</sup>

1 M.A. 394. Amīr Khān was the son of the maternal aunt of Aurangzīb, and had married the daughter of Amīr-ul-Umarā ‘Alī Mardān Khān. Among his great achievements was the regulation and settlement of the disturbed administration of the province. (See also Siyar 445).

After his accession to the throne, Bahādur Shāh appointed Ibrāhīm Khān, the son of 'Alī Mardān Khān, as the governor of Kabul. But the Khan failed to administer his charge in a proper manner. He was therefore superseded soon afterwards, and Nāṣir Khān was restored to his former post. Nāṣir Khān remained incharge of the province till his death in 1129 H/1717, when he was succeeded by his son, who was also entitled Nāṣir Khān. As the mother of Nāṣir Khān II was an Afghān, he had good relations with the Afghāns. He made a proper settlement of the country, and kept the roads in good order.<sup>4</sup>

In 1719, Sarbuland Khān succeeded Nāṣir Khān at the instance of Saiyid 'Abdullāh Khān. The tribesmen were apparently disaffected. Sarbuland Khān's son, Khān A'zam Khān, while returning from Kabul to Peshawar after conducting operations, was surprised by the tribesmen and lost all his baggage and most of his men. After the overthrow of the Saiyids, Nāṣir Khān II was restored.<sup>5</sup>

Meanwhile, a great change was coming over the politics of West Asia due to the rapid decline of the Ṣafwīd empire. The decline of the Ṣafwīds gave an opportunity to the Ghilza'ī Afghāns inhabiting the Qandhār region to organise their power. In 1709, the Ghilza'ī chief, Mīr Wais, rose against the Persians, and seized the fort of Qandhār. But it was left to Maḥmūd, the son of Mīr Wais (d.1715), to give the final blow to the Ṣafwīd empire. He forced Shāh Sultān Ḥusain Ṣafwī to surrender at Iṣfahān after a long siege (22nd October, 1722). He then deposed the Ṣafwīd monarch, and had himself crowned.

The Delhi court was the silent spectator of these events. It failed to realise the incipient danger to Kabul of an independent Afghān state on the border. When Nizām-ul-Mulk arrived at the court from the 2 See Raḡā'im ff. 15a-17a, 'Anecdotes' (Nos. 12, 15) for some of the letters of Aurangzīb to Shāh 'Ālam on this score.

3 See Sarkar, Aurangzīb's Reign, 113-18.

4 M.U. iii 833-35.

5 Kāmwar 481, Siyar 455, 460.

Deccan, he vaguely referred to an expedition to restore the Ṣafwīd, Shāh Tahmāsp, to Iṣfahān. But the court had neither the desire nor the power to do so. Instead, it sought to establish friendly relations with Maḥmūd by an exchange of letters.<sup>6</sup>

The victory of Maḥmūd at Iṣfahān was the signal for Russia and Turkey also to aggrandise themselves at the cost of Īrān.

Nādir Shāh gradually built up a position for himself by leading a Persian war of national resistance against all these encroachers. By 1730, Nādir had expelled the Ghilza'īs from the heart of Persia, and inflicted a signal defeat on the Abdālīs of Hīrāt. He then turned against the Turks. In a series of protracted campaigns, Nādir drove out the Turks from the territory of the Ṣafwīd empire, but failed to take Baghdad. Finally, exhaustion compelled the two sides to conclude a truce in 1736.<sup>7</sup>

In the course of the struggle to drive out the Afghāns, Turks and Russians from the former Ṣafwīd territory, Nādir had gathered together a band of faithful followers, and established his reputation as a bold and intrepid commander and leader of men. He had no difficulty in forcing Shāh Tahmāsp to abdicate in favour of his infant son in 1732, and finally, in ascending the throne himself in 1737.

ii. Racial Groups and Party Politics at the Court (1728-1737)

While these far-reaching changes were taking place across the border of India, the Mughal court was engrossed in factional politics and narrow self-seeking. We have noted in the previous chapter that the growing challenge of Marāthā invasion led to the emergence of a 'Peace' and a 'War' party at the court, led by the chief Bakhshī, Khān-i-Daurān, and the wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, respectively. Simultaneously, relations between different ethnic and regional groups inside the nobility and the army tended to become strained. It is probable that the real cause of this was the shrinkage of employment opportunities consequent on the loss of large portions of the empire by conquest, or by a process of open or concealed defacement of Imperial authority by the provincial governors and others. Hence, there was acute rivalry for the appropriation of the remaining jāgīrs and the profitable posts at the court. In the face of the growing paralysis of the central authority, each noble sought to create a band of devoted followers by a careful distribution of patronage. The creation of such a group increasingly became not merely a device for the capture of supreme power but a necessity for economic survival. Hence also the unusual degree of bitterness in the group politics of the period.

<sup>6</sup> Siyar 479.

<sup>7</sup> Lockhart, Nadir Shah, 105-11.

The two most important groups in the Mughal army at this time were the Mughals and the Afghans. In addition to these, there were sizable numbers of Hindustanis in the army and the nobility. These consisted of both Muslims and Hindus. The struggle between the various nobles and their following during this period has often been interpreted as a struggle between different ethnic groups, or, more specifically, between the "Mughals" and the "Hindustanis". However, most of the nobles had mixed contingents of Mughals, Afghans, Hindustanis etc. The political affiliations of the nobles, too, cut across racial and religious groups. Nevertheless, the testimony of contemporary writers shows that there was a certain degree of ill-will and a sense of rivalry between the Mughals and the non-Mughals, and that this sometimes led to an open conflict between them, and also affected relations between the nobles.

The wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, and Sa'adat Khān, the governor of Awadh, were regarded as the two great patrons of the "Mughals" at the court.<sup>8</sup> The following of Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān included 5,000 Tūrānīs, most of Sirhind being assigned to them for their pay. Sa'adat Khān gave special preference to the Īrānīs.<sup>9</sup> On the other hand, the following of Roshan-ud-Daulah Zafar Khān, a noble of Tūrānian extraction, consisted almost exclusively of Afghāns and Hindustanis.<sup>10</sup> The following of Khān-i-Daurān, who was also of Tūrānian extraction, consisted largely 8 Āshūb 562, ii 102, 378; Siyar 474.

9 Āshūb 314-315, Siyar 474. But Qamar-ud-Dīn's following also included Hindustanis. On one occasion, Sa'adat Khān clashed with Muẓaffar Khān, the brother of Khān-i-Daurān. Sa'adat Khān planned to raise 50,000 men from his śūbah of Awadh till Qamar-ud-Dīn came to his help, ostensibly on the ground that "the honour of the Mughals, Īrānīs or Tūrānīs, is one," but really on account of his rivalry with Khān-i-Daurān. (Most detailed account in Āshūb 373-9). This incident took place in 1731-32.

10 Āshūb 203-10, Wārid 26-32, Iqbāl, 171-173.

of Hindustanis. Āshūb says that as a result of his patronage of Hindustanis, the descendents of the Īrānī and Tūrānī servants of M. Ā'zam Shāh received a set-back. The author further complains that he (Khān-i-Daurān) hated the name 'Mughal' and all it stood for, and that "He confined his energies to the up-keep and maintenance of all that was Indian, whether Muslim or Hindu. Under him, infidel Rajas, Rājputs, Jats and zamindars—whoever was Indian—were free of molestation".<sup>11</sup>

The bitterness between the Mughals and the non-Mughals apparently increased during the period of Saiyid domination. Though not much in evidence during the period of Nizām-ul-Mulk's wizārat, it seems to have continued beneath the surface, and found dramatic expression in what is called the Shoe Sellers' Riot at Delhi in 1729. The riot arose out of a clash between one Subhkaran who was employed in the Khān-i-Samān's office and some Punjabi shoe-sellers on the occasion of the Shab-i-Barāt or festival of crackers. The shoe-sellers felt themselves the aggrieved party and vowed vengeance. Subhkaran took shelter at the house of Sher Afgan Khān Pānīpatī,<sup>12</sup> his official superior and a friend and relation of Roshan-ud-Daulah Pānīpatī. As Sher Afgan refused to surrender Subhkaran, and the ministers could not make up their mind in the matter, the shoe-sellers refused to let the Friday prayers be conducted at the Jāma' Masjid—a common procedure of showing resentment. The wazīr, Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, Roshan-ud-Daulah and Sher Afghan Khān came out with their following to maintain order. But their soldiers soon mingled with the crowd, and the riot became one between the Mughals on the one hand, and the Afghan and the Hindustani soldiers on the other.<sup>13</sup>

These events continued to excite popular imagination for a long time. But they can hardly be taken as proof that ethnic groups formed the main basis of the party conflict at the Mughal court. The real points at issue in the party politics were, as has been noted earlier, the question of the disposal of jāgīrs and high offices of state; the attitude to be taken towards the Marāthās, Rajputs, and Jats, etc. etc.

11 Āshūb 252-53.

12 He was the Khān-i-Sāmān, and was related to Roshan-ud-Daulah by marriage. His troops are described as Hindustani.

13 See Āshūb 203-10, Wārid 26-32, Iqbāl. 171-73, Irvine ii 256-63.

iii Invasion of Nādir Shāh and the Attitude of the Nobles.

The invasion of India by Nādir Shāh was not a sudden development. The possibility of a Persian invasion had long been discussed, and was, indeed, the topic of bazar gossip. For Nādir Shāh, the invasion of India was almost a logical step after the expulsion of the Ghilza'is and Abdālīs from Persia and the stalemate in the war with the Turks. It was only from India that he could replenish his treasury for a renewal of the war against the Turks, while the example of Taimūr and Babar beckoned towards India as the land where territory and laurels might be gained without much difficulty. The weakness of the Mughal empire was also no secret—specially after the series of set-backs suffered by Mughals arms at the hands of the Marāthās. The necessary pretext for invasion was provided by the Delhi government's unwillingness or inability to prevent the influx of Ghilzā'ī refugees from across the Afghan border. As early as 1730, Nādir had sent 'Alī Mardān Khān Shāmlū to Muḥammad Shāh with a letter from Shāh Ṭahmāsp, announcing his intention to march on Qandhār and asking the Emperor, in the common interest of his realm and that of Persia, and by reason of the old friendship between them, to close the frontier to all Afghan refugees once the operations had begun.<sup>14</sup> Muḥammad Shāh replied that the ṣūbahdārs of Kabul and Sindh were being instructed to comply, and that the Kabul army would be reinforced for the purpose.<sup>15</sup>

But Nādir Shāh became engrossed in the Turkish campaign and the Delhi court forgot all about the North-West once again. Khān-i-Daurān utilised the opportunity to bring to the Emperor's notice that Roshan-ud-Daulah Zafar Khān, who had been nominated to disburse the subsidy of 12 lakhs annually to the tribes of the North-West for keeping the passes open, had been regularly mis-appropriating half of it. This completed the ruin of Roshan-ud-Daulah who was also charged with peculating other sums. He was ordered to pay back two crores to the treasury, and lost his influence with the Emperor. The charge of disburs-

14 Āshūb 445-76 (text of Nādir's and Shāh Ṭahmāsp's letters), Lockhart 46-47.

15 Āshūb 476-81 (text of M. Shāh's reply). According to the author, at the time of his departure, the envoy was given 3 lakhs in cash and one lakh in goods by the Emperor, while he and his companions received another 3 lakhs in cash and kind from the nobles.

ing the subsidy was transferred to Khān-i-Daurān.<sup>16</sup> Khān-i-Daurān, while not personally corrupt, was averse to the governor of Kabul, Nāṣir Khān, who had been appointed through Roshan-ud-Daulah. He connived at the peculation of the subsidy, so that none of it reached Nāṣir Khān who was, moreover, a pious man, and negligent of the affairs of administration. Thus, the efficiency of the Kabul army deteriorated, and the frontier tribes became disaffected.<sup>17</sup>

After the accession of Shāh 'Abdās III in 1732, Nādir Shāh sent a second messenger. The Delhi court excused itself on the ground of preoccupation against the "Deccan infidels", and repeated the previous assurances.<sup>18</sup>

In 1737, when Nādir Shāh advanced against Qandhār, he sent further envoys.<sup>19</sup> The Mughal court's delay in sending a reply to Nādir Shāh and the detention of his envoy for more than a year<sup>20</sup> might have hardened Nādir Shāh's determination to invade India, but they can hardly be regarded as its primary causes. These, as has been noted, were both political and economic. However, Nādir Shāh kept up for a long time the pretence that his sole object was the destruction of the power of the Afghans—the common enemies of Persia and India. Before entering India, Nādir Shāh is also said to have declared that his major motive was to save the Mughal Emperor from the Marāthās.<sup>21</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Siyar 479.

<sup>17</sup> Siyar 479, M.U. iii 834-35.

<sup>18</sup> Ashūb 484-508 (text of Nādir Shāh's letter and the Emperor's reply).

<sup>19</sup> Āshūb 509-26, Jahānkusha 331-32, Siyar 480. According to the Hikāyat-i-Fath Nādirī (Anon, A.S.B. Cal. Ms., ff. 4b, 5a), Nādir re-iterated the old demand for barring the passage of the Afghān refugees and demanded a sum of rupees one crore for failing to check depredations by the Afghāns in the past. The Emperor was also reminded of the annuity which his ancestor (Humayun) had promised to pay (for Persian help).

<sup>20</sup> According to Āshūb (ii 51), apart from the inability of the nobles to make up their minds, a second reason for the envoy's detention was his infatuation for a dancing girl.

<sup>21</sup> Nādir Shāh is said to have written to the Emperor "My coming to Cabul and possessing myself thereof was purely out of zeal for Islam and friendship for you... my stay on this side of the Attock is with a view that when those infidels (the Marāthās) move towards Hindustan, I may send an army of the victorious Kizzilbash to drive them to the abyss of hell". (Fraeser Nādir Shāh, 138. But no mention in Āshūb).

It was a common belief at the time in India that Nādir Shāh was also invited to invade the country by the 'Mughal party', and in particular, by Nizām-ul-Mulk and Sa'ādat Khān.<sup>22</sup> The Marāthā wakīl at Delhi wrote, "It is evident that it is all the Nizam's game". Another contemporary observer noted, "The wazīr and the umarā thought that the Marāthās have become very strong and the Emperor weak; Baji Rao over-runs the country upto Delhi, and the Bhonsle has laid waste the country upto Bengal and Ayodhya. Therefore, the Īrānī Emperor should be called and a new empire established".<sup>23</sup>

In the absence of any documentary proof, it cannot be definitely established that Nādir Shāh was invited by any section at the court although such an invitation would have been quite understandable from the viewpoint of Nizām-ul-Mulk and Sa'ādat Khān. It is true that Nādir Shāh did not stand in need of such an invitation. However, after the defeat of Nizām-ul-Mulk at Bhopal, there remained no power in India capable of withstanding the Marāthās. Hence, certain elements at the court might have favoured an invasion by Nādir Shāh in the hope that he would destroy the Marāthā power in India, and leave the field clear for them.

The disaster which befell Mughal arms at Karnāl was not the result of any organised treachery, but was due to the want of daring, imagination, and unity on the part of the Mughal nobles against one of the greatest generals of the age in Asia. No attempt was made by the Mughal court to aid and assist the Governor of Kabul to withstand Nādir Shāh. Nor were the passes into India defended. According to some writers, the Delhi court seems to have imagined that Nādir Shāh would turn back after the conquest of Kabul (June 1737). Khān-i-Daurān was among those who pooh poohed most vigorously the alleged threat of a Persian invasion.<sup>24</sup> Perhaps, a more plausible explanation would be that the court was watching the outcome of the conflict between Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Marāthās, and awaiting the return of Nizām-ul-Mulk's armies to Delhi.

<sup>22</sup> The following contemporary authorities repeat the charge against Nizam; Jauhar f. 2b; T. Hindī (559) qualified by the words, "some people thought"; Hālāt-i-Nādir; Nādir Var-Nijabat (Punjab Hist. Society 1916); Trilok Das (Hindi poem J.A.S.B. 1897), Fraeser 129-32; Hanway iv 142. The Risālah-i-Muḥammad Shāh holds Sa'ādat Khān responsible for inviting Nādir Shāh.

<sup>23</sup> Ait. Charcha 4, Riyasat 384, 367.

<sup>24</sup> Siyar 481, Bayān.

But once Nādir Shāh had crossed the Indus (c.12 Dec. 1738), and started moving on Lahore, the Persian threat could no longer be discountenanced. Nizām-ul-Mulk had returned to the capital in April 1738. But he came only at the head of 5000-6000 horse, a small part of artillery and 2000-3000 foot-soldiers, having sent his best troops and artillery back to the Deccan.<sup>25</sup> The humiliating treaty that he had been forced to sign at Bhopal had also undermined his prestige, and revived old suspicions of a secret understanding between him and the Marāthās. Thus, the Mughal court found itself without any generally acceptable leader. At Khān-i-Daurān's instance, letters appealing for help were sent to Baji Rao and the Rajput princes. But the former was engaged in a campaign against Bassein, and no immediate response was forthcoming from the Rajput princes.<sup>26</sup> The only noble in the empire with his prestige unimpaired and large forces at his disposal was Sa'ādat Khān, the Governor of Awadh. Accordingly, at the suggestion of Nizām-ul-Mulk, he was summoned from his ṣūbah.<sup>27</sup> The nobles failed to agree among themselves on the allocation of command, precedence, etc.<sup>28</sup> Nizām-ul-

25 Āshūb 550-51. His idea is said to have been that if the nobles listened to him, the Imperial Army would obey him and he could accomplish the task with its help. If, on the other hand, the nobles were hostile and attempted to ruin him, he would draw aside with his small army.

Perhaps, a more compelling reason for sending back the army was the fear of Marāthā incursions during his absence.

26 Rajwade vi 130; Siyar 482; Dighe 151-52.

27 A. Lal, loc. cit., 62-63.

28 Jauhar (4b-5a), Iqbāl. (215-17). T. Hindī 560, 'Alī Ḥazīn (282-87), and Siyar (482-83) emphasise the rivalry and jealousy between Nizām-ul-Mulk and Khān-i-Daurān so that the plan proposed by one was opposed by the other.

On the other hand, Āshūb, who is generally "pro-Mughal" and opposed to Khān-i-Daurān, says that at the court, contrary to all his expectations, Nizām-ul-Mulk was befriended by Khān-i-Daurān who daily conferred with him, and asked his advice as to how best to deal with Nādir Shāh. (Āshūb 554, 557).

Mulk wanted, at first, that Prince Aḥmad Shāh should be nominated to the command of the armies. But Khān-i-Daurān opposed this scheme, and asked for the supreme command and unfettered powers for himself. Finally, all the nobles agreed that the Emperor should be requested to lead the armies personally.<sup>29</sup>

Meanwhile, news arrived of the fall of Lahore (12 Jan., 1739), and the submission of the governor, Zakariyah Khān, to Nādir Shāh. Hence, it was decided to entrench at Panipat, and to await the arrival of Sa'adat Khān.

Sa'adat Khān started from Faizabad towards the end of January.<sup>30</sup> But he did not come by forced marches as might have been expected. According to some writers, this was out of a desire on his part to see Khān-i-Daurān defeated before his arrival. But others ascribe it to an abcess in his leg. Perhaps, Sa'adat Khān wanted the Mughal court to feel its helplessness and dependence on him, and hence deliberately approached slowly. More inexcusable was the conduct of his soldiers on the way. They ravaged the chakla of Etawah which was the jāgīr of Khān-i-Daurān, and heaped cruelties on women and children. On reaching Delhi, Sa'adat Khān took a large sum of money from the treasury without permission, and distributed it among his soldiers.<sup>31</sup> But the court was in no position to protest against these high-handed proceedings.

At mid-night on February 12/13, Sa'adat Khān reached the fortified Mughal camp at Karnāl, after covering the last seventy miles in four days. The Persian and the Indian armies had been lying face to face for a couple of days. The following morning, Sa'adat Khān waited upon the Emperor, and, according to one writer, plans of operation were being discussed when news arrived that about 500 camels belonging to the baggage train of Sa'adat Khān had been looted by the Persian forces.<sup>32</sup> Sa'adat Khān immediately asked the Emperor for permission to proceed against Nādir Shāh. What followed is not

<sup>29</sup> Iqbāl 215-17.

<sup>30</sup> A. Lal, loc. cit., 63.

<sup>31</sup> Iqbāl 231.

<sup>32</sup> Harcharandas, Bayān 34, T. Hindī 562.

quite clear. According to some authorities, Nizām-ul-Mulk counselled the delay of a few days as the Awadh armies were tired by incessant marching.<sup>33</sup> He is said to have remarked to Sa'adat Khān that he only had experience of fighting zamindars, while this was a battle between Kings and should only be fought after proper preparation by the artillery, etc. By this time, the day was also well advanced.<sup>34</sup>

It seems that the Emperor concurred with Nizām-ul-Mulk, and that Khān-i-Daurān also supported his view. But Sa'adat Khān was adamant, and rushed away, determined to fight a lone battle if necessary.<sup>35</sup> This placed the Emperor and the nobles in a quandry. Khān-i-Daurān decided to risk battle along with Sa'adat Khān rather than let him fight alone;<sup>36</sup> while the Emperor and Nizām-ul-Mulk also drew up their forces in battle array.<sup>37</sup>

By the time the Indian forces came out to fight, it was already past noon, or dark according to some others.<sup>38</sup> The Indian commanders had neither any plan of campaign, nor any co-ordination between their forces. The light screen of Persian horses retreated before them and having separated the forces of the two nobles from each other, led them into a trap which allowed full play to Nādir Shāh's deadly artillery. Thus, the Persians made short work of the Indian forces. Meanwhile,

<sup>33</sup> Bayān 34, Ānand 27, Siyar 483.

<sup>34</sup> Hikāyat 23a.

<sup>35</sup> Bayān 34, Ānand 27, Siyar 483.

<sup>36</sup> Iqbāl (232) says that Khān-i-Daurān had planned to fight the following day, but he did not want to be left behind and to let Sa'adat Khān get all the credit (for a victory).

Ānandram (27) says that Khān-i-Daurān objected to fighting that day, but that the Emperor overruled him.

The Delhi Chronicle (quoted by Sarkar, Later Mughals, ii 343) and Bayān 34 say that the Emperor ordered Khān-i-Daurān to attack the Persians.

<sup>37</sup> Iqbāl 237, Siyar 483, Later Mughals 344.

<sup>38</sup> Bayān 34, and Ānand 27 say that there were only a few hours of day-light left; Siyar 483 says that it was nearly three o'clock. But Jahān-Kushā (235) simply says that the sun had begun to decline from its meridian when the Indian armies were suddenly seen coming out for battle. According to the Khiyāfat Nūmah-i-Himāyūnī (349), the battle started at one o'clock.

Nizām-ul-Mulk calmly sat on an elephant at the head of his army, and sipped coffee.<sup>39</sup>

Sa'adat Khān was certainly rash, to say the least, in risking battle with a seasoned commander like Nādir Shāh without adequate preparation and without coordinating his plans with and in opposition to the views of other prominent nobles. But once he had gone into battle, it would have been more appropriate for Nizām-ul-Mulk to join with him in one concerted onslaught on Nādir Shāh, rather than staying aloof and facing the certainty of subsequent defeat.<sup>40</sup> As it was, Khān-i-Daurān was mortally wounded, and his younger brother, Muẓaffar Khān, and all three of his sons and many other relations and followers were killed, while Sa'adat Khān was made captive after suffering severe losses. The only course left now for Nizām-ul-Mulk was to negotiate with Nādir Shāh. From the beginning, the negotiations turned on the indemnity to be paid by the Delhi court. At first, Nādir Shāh stipulated with Nizām-ul-Mulk for an indemnity of only fifty lakhs, out of which twenty lakhs were to be paid immediately, and the rest in instalments by the time Nādir Shāh reached Attock.<sup>41</sup> But it seems that later Nādir Shāh changed his mind, and decided to demand more, either because he had never been serious about the previous demand, or according to popular belief, because Sa'adat Khān was enraged at the Emperor's conferring the office of Mīr Bakhshī which had been left vacant by the death of Khān-i-Daurān, on Nizām-ul-Mulk, and decided to wreck the agreement made by the latter, suggesting to Nādir Shāh that he could get a much bigger sum by occupying Delhi.<sup>42</sup> Or, the same advice might have been given by others. It is significant that throughout the negotiations, Nādir Shāh closely invested the Indian encampment, and allowed no foodgrains to go inside.<sup>43</sup> Having reduced the Indian camp

39 Siyar 483. For details of the battle, see Later Mughals 345-47, Lockhart 137-39.

40 Most contemporary authors are sharply critical of Nizām-ul-Mulk for his failure to help Khān-i-Daurān and Sa'adat Khān. Thus, see Bayān, Jauhar, and T. Hindī 565. See also S.P.D. xv 75 for the views of a Marāthā wakīl.

41 Harcharandas, Later Mughals 354.

42 T. Hindī 568. Harcharan.

43 Harcharan, Jahānkushā 237, Later Mughals 355, 357.

to sore straits, he summoned Nizām-ul-Mulk, and demanded from him an indemnity of twenty crores. Since Nizām-ul-Mulk could give no assurance that this staggering indemnity would be paid, he was placed in confinement.<sup>44</sup> Muḥammad Shāh was now deprived of his last means of resistance, and meekly surrendered.

Having thus secured the person of the Emperor and made his leading nobles captives, Nādir Shāh could enter Delhi without having to undertake a prolonged and costly siege. The story of the subsequent massacre and exactions is only too well known.<sup>45</sup> The populace of Delhi was assessed at two crores of rupees, and leading nobles like Nizām-ul-Mulk, Sa'adat Khān and Sarbuland Khān were forced to act as tax-collectors. In many cases, torture was applied. Apart from this, a vast sum was also collected in jewellery and goods. According to reliable estimates, the total value in cash and kind secured by Nādir Shāh came to about seventy crores.<sup>46</sup> Before his departure, Nādir Shāh also forced the Emperor to sign a treaty making over to him the territories to the west of the river Indus, including "the provinces of Thatta and the ports and fortresses belonging to them".<sup>47</sup> To complete the humiliation of the Emperor, he was also forced to agree to the marriage of one of the royal princesses to the son of the upstart, Nādir Shāh.<sup>48</sup>

The effects of Nādir Shāh's invasion continued to be felt long after his departure. The invasion proclaimed the real weakness of the 44 Ibid. T. Hindī (569) and the Marāthā wakil ascribe all this to the duplicity of Nizām-ul-Mulk, and his attempt to curry favour with Nādir Shāh.

45 See Ānandram and Hikāyat (ff 37 a b) for some of the cruelties practised. A long dispatch from Jugal Kishore Sarwar, the wakil of Bengal, gives a graphic account of these extortions and the state of Delhi during the occupation of Nādir. We are told that Khush-hāl, Peshkāṛ of the Mīr Bakshī, was made to pay Rs. 2,57,000; and Sita Ram Khazānchī, 3 lakhs. Besides this, 2 crores and 12 lakhs were realized from Qamar-ud-Dīn, Sa'adat Khān, Nizām-ul-Mulk and the Qāzīs etc. (Anglo-Arabic School, Patna, doc.)

46 For details, see Later Mughals 370-73, Lockhart 152-53.

47 Jahānkushā 243, Āshūb.

48 Lockhart 151. According to Jugal Kishore Sarwar (loc. cit.), 3 daughters of Muẓaffar Khān deceased (brother of Khān-i-Daurān), and 16 women from his haram were forced by Nādir Shāh to enter his own haram.

Mughal empire to the entire world, particularly to the European adventurers who were gradually extending their commercial activities from the coastal regions of India and were watching the political situation in the country with keen interest.

The invasion of Nādir Shāh demonstrated forcefully that a new political situation had been created in North India. The loss of Kabul and the areas to the west of the Indus deprived India of an advance post for the country's defence and a vantage point for following West Asian affairs. All the Indian powers including the Marāthās were made painfully aware that a new force had arisen in West Asia and that India could no longer bank on her North-West regions being safe from recurrent foreign invasions. Whether these invasions would be in the nature of plundering raids only, or would aim also at the creation of a new dynastic empire remained to be seen.

The incipient threat of further invasions from the North-West led Baji Rao to postulate a new approach to the Mughal Empire, visualising a united front of all Indian powers under the aegis of the Emperor, with the Marāthās playing the leading part in the coalition. The parties at the Mughal Court were also affected by Nādir Shāh's invasion. Among the old leaders, Sa'ādat Khān and Khān-i-Daurān died, while Nizām-ul-Mulk and Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān forfeited the confidence of the Emperor for their sorry part in the battle of Karnal. Nizām-ul-Mulk decided once again to leave the Mughal court to its devices and sought an agreement with the Marāthās for maintaining his position in the Deccan. Safdar Jang, Amīr Khān, and a number of other nobles gradually rose in the Emperor's favour. The decline in the Imperial prestige led to a resumption of the old struggle for wizārat, with the important difference that the issue now was no longer one of revivifying the empire by internal reforms and new policies, but of preventing the Emperor from falling under the domination of either one or another of the 'powers' contending for mastery in North India.

The wealth extorted by Nādir Shāh from the Emperor, his nobles, the commercial classes, and the citizens of Delhi represented a big drain on the resources of the country. It not only dealt a crippling blow to the power and authority of the Emperor who was left with no cash reserves for an emergency, but affected also the position of Delhi as one of the prime commercial marts of North India. The general impoverishment of the nobles led to a sharpening of the struggle for the possession of jāgīrs. Simultaneously, the tendency towards the rack-renting of the peasantry became more marked. The realisation of land-revenue, never a peaceful affair, became more and more a kind of military operation in the course of which villages were devastated and large number of peasants were massacred.

Thus the various internal problems of the Empire were intensified.

Nādir Shāh's invasion also led to the introduction of the quick-firing musket and improved light artillery in India. Characteristically, the Rohilla Afghans were the first to adopt them, while the Marāthās adhered to their traditional mode of light-cavalry war-fare—an omission for which they were to pay dearly.<sup>49</sup>

Finally, the rise of Nādir Shāh and his invasion of India ended the close cultural contact between India and Persia which had subsisted during the two preceding centuries. The Indian frontier no longer marched with Īrān and Tūrān so that the flow of adventurers from these countries into India finally stopped. While it is doubtful if this had any important bearing on the fate of the Mughal empire which was tottering to its death due to deep-seated problems to which no satisfactory solution was forthcoming, it had an indirect bearing on Indian social and cultural development. The Īrānī and Tūrānī immigrants who had settled down in India now found it even more difficult to stand aside as a separate cultural and social group, or to adopt an attitude of social and cultural superiority. Thus, the forces making for the creation of a composite culture and society in the country were strengthened in the long run.

<sup>49</sup> The Rohilla infantry armed with muskets and light-artillery successfully defied the Marāthā lightly-armed cavalry before the battle of Panipat (1761). If the Marāthās had been able to over-come the Rohillas, the entire political situation in North India would have changed (see Sarkar, Fall, ii 208-16).

CONCLUDING REMARKS

In the light of the preceding study, attention might be drawn towards some main points regarding the character and role of the nobility after the death of Aurangzīb and the trend of politics in the eighteenth century.

In the first place, the general assumption that parties and politics at the court of the later Mughals were based on ethnic or religious groupings among the nobility is not borne out. The groups which were formed at the Court towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign were based on clan and family relationships, or personal affiliations and interests. Thus, Zu'lfiqār Khān, who was of Irānī extraction, was supported by a leading Tūrānī noble like 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān, by an Afghan noble, Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, and by Hindus such as Rao Ram Singh Hārā and Dalpat Bundela. The Saiyids, who are said to have been the champions of the Hindustanis, attempted to secure the support of important Tūrānī nobles such as Niẓām-ul-Mulk, M. Amīn Khān and 'Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān. But after Farrukh Siyar's deposition, when Niẓām-ul-Mulk made a bid for power, he raised the slogans of race and religion, urging that the struggle against the Saiyids was a struggle for the honour of all Mughals, whether Irānī or Tūrānī, and that the monarchy and Islam were in danger from the Saiyids and their Hindu allies. However, of the two leading Rajput Rajas, Jai Singh and Ajit Singh, the former was an inveterate enemy of the Saiyids. Chhabelā Ram Nāgar and Dayā Bahādur also resisted the Saiyid authority by force of arms. As for the Saiyid alliance with the Marāthās, the "orthodox" Niẓām-ul-Mulk did not hesitate in 1724, and afterwards, in entering into an alliance with the Marāthās, whenever it suited his political purposes. In the subsequent period, the Wazīr Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, Sa'ādat Khān Burhān-ul-Mulk (the founder of the Nawabi of Awadh), M. Khān Bangash (an Afghan), and Raja Abhai Singh of Jodhpur formed one group, while Khān-i-Daurān (the descendent of a Tūrānī immigrant) and Raja Jai Singh remained on the other side along with some Afghan nobles. Hence, it would appear that slogans of race and religion were raised by individual nobles only to suit their convenience, and that the actual groupings cut across ethnic and religious divisions.

The background to the rise of parties at the Court was the decline in the prestige of the monarchy as a result of Aurangzīb's failure to deal satisfactorily with the oppositional movements of the Marāthās, Jats, Rajputs etc. The civil wars following the death of Aurangzīb further weakened the position of the monarchy, specially as no competent monarch emerged successful from them. Simultaneously, the crisis of the jāgīrdārī system which had been steadily worsening led to inordinate delays in the allotment of jāgīrs, and even when a jāgīr was allotted there was sometimes a considerable gap between its paper and its real income. One reason for the growth of parties at the Court was the scramble for the best and most easily manageable jāgīrs, the lion's share going to the more powerful political group. The struggle for wizārat was to some extent a struggle between such groups. Each group consisted of powerful individuals and their supporters who tried to win a leading position in the affairs of the state by securing control of the leading offices at the court, particularly the offices of the wazīr and the Mīr Bakhshi. Simultaneously, an attempt was made to dominate the Emperor, and to restrict his freedom of intercourse with rival nobles in order to guard against intrigue. Hence, they also tried to secure control of the posts which gave access to the Emperor.

The struggle for wizārat was not a struggle between the monarchy and the nobility as such, for the nobles had no common bonds or interests. In fact, one of the few points of agreement among them was regarding the divine right of the Timurids to rule, since no group among the nobles felt strong enough to set up a new monarchy, and the Timurids still enjoyed considerable prestige.

But it would be wrong to see in the struggle for wizārat merely a fight between rival groups of nobles for office and power. Zu'lfikār Khān and the Saiyid Brothers who enjoyed a dominating position in the state for some time, attempted to use their power to institute policies and measures aimed at giving a new lease of life to the Mughal empire. These nobles did not seek exclusive power for themselves. But their pre-eminent position aroused the jealousy of some nobles who intrigued to remove them from office and power.

The crisis might have been resolved if the wazīrs had enjoyed the confidence and support of the monarchs. In that case, the wazīr might have been able to carry through the reforms and policies necessary to revivify the empire. But since the wazīrs generally secured office due to their political and military strength, the monarchs were led to believe by interested sections that a capable and powerful wazīr would try to reduce the monarch to a nullity, and that he might even try to set up a new dynasty. The monarchs, instead of acting as a stabilising force, became the focus of intrigue against their own wazīrs. This attitude towards the wizārat resulted in a series of violent internal crises which increasingly divided the whole court and the nobility into hostile factions struggling for supreme power. It was in this situation that the Saiyids were led to take the bold step of deposing the ruling monarch in order to place on the throne someone more amenable to their wishes, and gathering into their own hands the leading reins of authority. But the step defeated its own purpose, for it united powerful sections of the nobles in opposition to them, and ultimately led to their downfall.

Since the wazīrs could not secure the aid of the monarch, they tried to organise a bloc of supporters powerful enough to overawe all their rivals as well as the monarch. This created the danger that a successful wazīr might try to set up a new dynasty. However, no group inside the nobility was powerful enough to dominate the rest. Therefore, the question of setting up a new dynasty hardly arose, unless some powerful extraneous element intervened in the situation. But if the empire was not to be governed by a capable monarch or a competent wazīr exercising power with his backing, there was every danger that powerful and ambitious nobles might try to set up independent principalities, thus disintegrating the empire. Thus, the monarchs found that the only alternative to an all-powerful wazīr was the break-up of the empire.

Nizām-ul-Mulk was faced with this situation after the over-throw of the Saiyids, whom he had denounced as traitors to the dynasty. He had to reckon with the opposition of a powerful group at the court and the under-hand hostility of the Emperor. Nizām-ul-Mulk preferred to leave the court, and to carve out a principality for himself in the Deccan. His action was emulated by many other nobles who made themselves the masters of large tracts while paying nominal allegiance to the Emperor.

Thus, the leading nobles who could have helped to institute policies and measures designed to consolidate and strengthen the Mughal empire, became themselves a prime factor in its disintegration.

A review of the struggle for wizārat suggests that a monarchical despotism such as that of the Mughal emperors was not capable of developing into a limited monarchy in which the king might only reign and be a symbol of unity, while the wazīr ruled as the real hub of power. The Mughal despotism could only be replaced by another monarchical despotism or by a series of states held together in a system of balance of power. The social forces which made the growth of a constitutional monarchy possible in England were far too weak and undeveloped in seventeenth century India, allowing full play to the forces of disintegration that were strong in a feudal society.

The struggle for wizārat also involved a struggle over policies. This conflict touched some of the most vital issues that had faced the Mughal empire since its inception and particularly during the long reign of Aurangzīb. Thus, such questions as the attitude to be adopted towards the Rajput states and individual Rajput Rajas, the status of the Hindus and the levying of cesses like the jizyah, the policy to be followed towards the Marāthās and such recalcitrant elements as the Jats—all these became issues of party politics. Basically, the question was whether the state ought to be based in the main on the Muslims, and rest on racist and religious foundations, or whether it should be broad-based on the support of both Muslims and Hindus, being essentially secular in spirit. Even in the time of Bahadūr Shāh, there was a trend towards a softer attitude towards the Rajputs and the Jats, and a certain laxity was allowed in the collection of the jizyah. During Jahāndār Shāh's reign, Zu'lfīqār Khān abolished the jizyah and promised high manṣabs and posts to the Rajput Rajas. He had earlier concluded a private pact with Shāhū for the payment to him of the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan. The policy of Zu'lfīqār Khān was taken up after his downfall by the Saiyid brothers. They once again attempted to broad-base the state on the support of the Hindus as well as the Muslims, and moved in the direction of a composite ruling class consisting of all sections of Muslims and of the Rajputs as well as the Marāthās—even granting concessions to the Jats leaders (but not to the Sikhs). It is irrelevant for our purposes to argue that some at any rate of these concessions were made under the compulsion of events, and were the consequence of weakness rather than any well thought out policy. Whatever the circumstances, they point to the working of certain definite forces within contemporary society. The new trend was not to the liking of certain sections in the nobility which opposed the Saiyids, and denounced their policies as pro-Hindu and as being against the best interests of the empire and the monarchy, as well as being opposed to the 'faith'. But the attempt of Nizām-ul-Mulk who championed these sections to tread his way back to the policies of Aurangzīb met with the determined opposition of the large majority of the nobles and also of the subordinate officials among whom, we are told, Hindus and 'Hindustanis' predominated. This was followed by the withdrawal of Nizām-ul-Mulk from the court, and the creation by him of a semi-independent principality in the Deccan.

Thus, the exclusionist policies associated with the name of Aurangzīb lasted only for a short time. In the 197 years of Mughal rule, from the foundation of the empire in 1526 to the invasion of Nādir Shāh in 1739, jizyah was collected only for 57 years. While this is not a true index of the attitude of the state towards the Hindus and of the position of the orthodox elements inside the empire during this period, it is at least a rough indicator. The forces which made for mutual toleration and understanding between the Hindus and the Muslims, and for the creation of a composite culture in which both Hindus and Muslims cooperated, had been silently at work for the past several centuries, and had gathered too much momentum to be lightly deflected by temporary political difficulties. The dominant picture of the eighteenth century is not of the Hindus and the Muslims forming mutually exclusive and antagonistic groups but of their cooperating in cultural affairs and social life, and of a remarkable absence of sectarian passions from political conflicts. Stray cases of communal passions may be encountered here and there.

Some religious divines sought to interpret the contemporary political tussle in religious terms. Thus, Shāh Walīullāh sought to rally the Muslims for the defence of the Mughal empire, and dubbed the Marāthās as the enemies of the Muslim faith. He was not without his parallels among the Hindus, too, though it is not possible to point to any single dominant personality. But, on the whole, the Marāthā bid for political domination did not disturb the tenor of social life or unduly strain the relations of Hindus and Muslims in North India. Political alliances and shifts were decided primarily on political considerations. Thus, even Nizām-ul-Mulk was quite prepared, when it suited him, to countenance Marāthā encroachments on the Mughal empire. The Emperor and his advisers, on their part, were not loath to encourage Marāthā pretensions in the Deccan at the cost of Nizām-ul-Mulk. The Rajput and Bundela princes initially attempted to block the Marāthā advance towards North India. Later, the Bundelas deemed it more profitable to enter into a defensive and offensive alliance with them, while Jai Singh Sawai attempted to play the peace-maker between them and the hapless Mughal court. On the other hand, the Rathor prince, Abhai Singh, continued to oppose the Marāthā invaders. Even Jai Singh never threw in his lot with the Marāthās as has been erroneously asserted on the basis of some crude forgeries. At a later date, both the Jats and the Nawab of Awadh befriended the Marāthās, only to abandon them on the eve of Panipat due to the endless rapacity of the latter. On their part, the Marāthās abandoned the ideal of a Hindu-pad-padshahi, aspiring only to rule the country in the name of the Emperor, and fully content to act and behave like other Mughal nobles. Thus, the basic trend of politics in the eighteenth century was secular. In the field of culture, too, there was a remarkable absence of narrow sectarian prejudices. The Marāthās adopted almost wholesale the Mughal court etiquette, and many social practices from north India found their way into Marāthā society.

The rapidity of the advance of the Marāthās towards north India during the second and third decades of the eighteenth century and the helplessness and inanity of the Mughal Court in opposing them is partially responsible for the belief that the nobility of the Mughals, as a whole, had become decadent and effete. Various explanations have been advanced for this alleged decadence of the Mughal nobility—excessive luxury including the practice of maintaining large harams, the enervating climate of India, the religious policy of Aurangzīb which condemned the Muslims to the sterile profession of arms, the heterogeneous character of the Mughal nobility, the drying up of the life-giving flow of recruits from Central Asian countries after the death of Aurangzīb, etc. etc. Most of these explanations are wide off the mark and have been put forward, singly or in conjunction, and in one form or another, to explain virtually every important turn in Medieval Indian history from the Ghorid invasion onwards. However, decadence must be considered an economic rather than a social phenomenon. There has been no historical period in which men of ability and character are wholly wanting. Moreover, judged by this test alone, the first half of the eighteenth century can scarcely be classified as a period of decadence. For during this period, we find a large number of capable administrators, generals, and men of learning and culture. This is the period during which the Saiyid brothers and Nizām-ul-Mulk, ‘Abduṣ Ṣamad Khān and Zakariyah Khān, Sa‘adat Khān and Safdar Jang, Murshid Qulī Khān and Jai Singh Sawai to name only a few of the most important ones come to the forefront. It is a different matter that the capacities and capabilities of these individuals were generally exercised not in advancing the interests of the empire, but in carving out their own principalities and in serving their own ends.<sup>1</sup>

In a historical sense, therefore, decadence has meaning if

- 1 As long as these nobles lived, the tasks of a civilised government were, on the whole, efficiently discharged within their principalities. The “great anarchy” on which British historians like to dwell, and which has been put forward as a historical justification for the British conquest of India, was neither as wide-spread nor as prolonged as it has been made out to be. In the areas which had been brought under the control of one of the “Nawabs”, or had passed under the domination of the Marāthās, the old system of administration often continued without much change, specially at the district or pargana level, and passed over into the later British administration in many cases. The period of anarchy and misrule in most areas is really to be dated from the third battle of Panipat, and from the time the British and other foreign powers started actively intervening in the internal affairs of the Indian states.

applied to a society which is no longer growing in an economic sense. Such a society has certain typical features—a deep-seated financial crisis, pessimism and loss of faith in the future often leading to the growth of irrationalist and obscurantist ideas, the stagnation of science and technology, etc. Many of these symptoms are to be found in Indian society during the second half of the seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth century. It is beyond the scope of the present work to undertake a detailed survey of the economic trends in Indian society during this period in order to determine the causes or the actuality of economic stagnation and decline. Till the completion of such a task by scholars, many of our conclusions regarding political and cultural trends during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries must remain somewhat tentative. However, it would not be far wrong to assert that the disintegration of the Mughal empire was not due to any absolute decline in the character or capabilities of the nobility of the Mughals. Nor was it due to the existence of diverse ethnic, national and religious elements in the nobility. The groups and factions which figure so largely in later Mughal politics were not organised along ethnic, or national or sectarian lines. In fact, the existence of diverse ethnic and religious elements made for tolerance and more liberal politics, and prevented a bid to establish an exclusive kind of domination by any one group which would have been no less disastrous to the empire, and would perhaps have entailed social consequences of a more harmful nature. The successful fusing together of these diverse elements into a group with a largely common outlook and common cultural values must be counted one of the lasting achievements of the Mughal emperors. The creation of such a ruling group had, in turn, a definite influence on contemporary Indian culture and society which acquired a broader, more assimilative and cosmopolitan outlook. This outlook did not come to an end with the reign of Aurangzīb, but is clearly seen at work during the eighteenth century.

The economic and financial crisis which forms an under-current to the seventeenth century, and which steadily worsened during the reign of Aurangzīb, assumed a particularly acute form during the eighteenth century. By the time Bahādūr Shāh died (1712), the accumulated treasures of previous generations had been exhausted.

The manṣabdārs of lower ranks found it virtually impossible to make the two ends meet on the income from their jāgīrs, which was not a fraction of their paper value, and fluctuated greatly from year to year. Bahādūr Shāh's reckless generosity in granting jāgīrs and increments threatened either to make the manṣabs meaningless (since means for maintaining the requisite quota were lacking), or to start the dangerous process of frittering away khālīṣah lands.

The process went much further during the reign of Jahāndār Shāh. Established rules of business were thrown to the winds, and the farming of even khālīṣah lands became common. In the circumstances, sufficient attention could not be paid to the extension and improvement of cultivation. On the contrary, farming of the revenues seems to have led to tack-renting, and adversely affected the peasantry. Thus, actual revenues fell even further. The civil wars exhausted whatever financial reserves remained.

The Saiyids never showed much competence in administrative and revenue affairs. 'Abdullāh Khān left his affairs in the hands of Ratan Chand, who persisted in the practice of farming out the khālīṣah lands. The division of the court into sharply opposed factions encouraged zamindars and recalcitrant elements everywhere who began to withhold revenue. In the Deccan, the Marāthās began to realise practically half the revenue, while the Jats and Sikhs created disturbances around Agra and Lahore.

After the overthrow of the Saiyids, Nizām-ul-Mulk made a bold bid to institute an enquiry into the jāgīrs held by subordinate employees and nobles, and to abolish the practice of farming out khālīṣah lands. But he could not carry through his proposals, and abandoned his attempt to reform the empire.

Thereafter, the process of the setting up of semi-independent principalities by provincial governors and powerful nobles, and of the with-holding of revenue by zamindars became particularly marked. The effective control of the Emperor was soon confined to a small principality around Delhi, his income being derived from it and from such tribute as his "subordinate" rulers cared to send him.

Thus, a financial and administrative crisis accompanied and accentuated the process of political disintegration.

In the light of developments during the period under review, it appears unhistorical to ascribe to Aurangzīb's religious policy a major responsibility for the downfall of the Mughal empire. However undesirable and retrogressive some features of Aurangzīb's religious policy might appear to a modern mind nurtured in the spirit of secularism, an objective approach to history demands that the line of distinction between cause and effect should not be blurred. Jizyah and other discriminatory practises (such as the ban on the use of 'Arabī and 'Irāqī horses by the Hindus, the ban on their use of palkis inside the gulāl-bār, etc.) were abandoned barely half a dozen years after the death of Aurangzīb. Mughal forces were withdrawn from Jodhpur, and high manṣabs and jāgīrs were given once again to the Rajput Rajas. In 1713, Jai Singh and the Bundelas joined together to inflict a crushing defeat on the Marāthās in Malwa. Both Jai Singh and Ajit Singh played a not inconsiderable role in Mughal court politics. In the case of the Marāthās, Shāhū was released from captivity and allowed to resume control of the territories in Shivaji's swarajya. By 1718, the Marāthās were also officially granted the chauth and sardeshmukhi of the Deccan. Nor are there any instances of the destruction of temples or of forced conversion during this period.

But even the wholesale abandonment of Aurangzīb's policies could not save the Mughal empire from disintegration. Many complex factors contributed to the break-up of the empire. Medieval Indian society lacked any essential basis of economic unity between the towns and the countryside. The economic atomism inherent in an economy based on self-sufficient village units encouraged atomism in the political sphere. The Mughals attempted to counter this fundamental atomism by a variety of devices, political, economic and cultural. While these policies cannot be gone into in detail here, broadly speaking the Mughals attempted to associate themselves with the culture of the country, not to interfere with the religious beliefs and customs of the people as far as possible, and to develop in the country a composite ruling class consisting of both Hindus and Muslims. With some set-back in the time of Aurangzīb, this policy was generally pursued throughout the 17th century. The Mughals also strove to protect and extend agriculture, to protect and foster trade, and to stimulate production in various ways. The stimulus of economic development contributed to the growth of towns: Agra, Delhi, Lahore, Ahmadabad etc. developed to a size comparable to the greatest towns in the world at the time.<sup>1</sup> But these developments could not proceed sufficiently far to alter the fundamental character of the village-economy which continued to rest on local self-sufficiency and subsistence farming, with only small exceptions in some areas. Hence, the peasant did not feel that he had any stake in a large centralized empire, and in disturbed times tended to turn towards anyone who could offer him protection. Apart from the peasants, there was, as indicated earlier, the numerous and well-entrenched class of zamindars who were not interested in the creation and maintenance of a strong, centralised state. As against this, the classes that were directly interested in integration were comparatively weak, and numerically small. The traders and merchants who stood most in need of integration were economically too dependent on the feudal classes to aspire to an independent role. This made the role of the nobility crucial. As long as the nobility cooperated with the monarchy in preserving law and order, and administered the state with due regard to the promotion of trade and industry and the development of agriculture, they could enjoy the goodwill of the peasants and the cooperation of the business community: the support of these broad sections was a definite factor in helping them to keep in check the separatist and disruptionist tendencies of the zamindars, rajas and other chiefs of various types. But when mutual trust and cooperation between the nobles and the monarchs came to an end, and the nobles could no longer realise their ambitions in the service of the state, the highly centralized, bureaucratic system of administration built up by the Mughals collapsed rapidly.

We have attempted to investigate in the present work some of the causes which were responsible for the conversion of the Mughal nobility from an instrument of integration into an instrument of the disintegration of the empire. Opinions might vary about the respective share of the nobility and the elements represented by the Marāthās, Rajputs, Jats etc. in the break up of the empire. But few will deny that the nobility had no mean share in it. It is difficult to set a precise date when the nobles ceased to find in the service of the empire an adequate outlet for the fulfillment of their ambitions. We have seen that the crisis of the jāgīrdārī system became manifest by the middle of the seventeenth century, and steadily worsened during the long reign of Aurangzīb. By the beginning of the eighteenth century, it had reached the state of acute crisis, foreshadowing a complete breakdown or a total re-organisation. But even a total re-organisation would have only postponed for some time a final breakdown unless ways and means were found of over-coming the economic and technological stagnation of contemporary Indian society.

1 See Palseart, Jahangir's India, 7, 46; Thevenot, Travels, 44-46, etc.

Thus, the roots of the disintegration of the Mughal empire may be found in the Medieval Indian economy ; the stagnation of trade, industry and scientific development within the limits of that economy ; the growing financial crisis which took the form of a crisis of the jāgīrdārī system and effected every branch of state activity ; the inability of the nobility to realise in the circumstances their ambitions in the service of the state and, consequently, the struggle of factions and the bid of ambitious nobles for independent dominion ; the inability of the Mughal emperors to accommodate the Marāthās and to adjust their claims within the framework of the Mughal empire, and the consequent break-down of the attempt to create a composite ruling class in India ; and the impact of all these developments on politics at the court and in the country, and upon the security of the north-western passes. Individual failings and faults of character also played their due role but they have necessarily to be seen against the background of these deeper, more impersonal factors.

APPENDIX B

Document to Illustrate the Early Relations of the Saiyids and the Rajputs (see Chapter IV pp. 99-100).

Text of Pancholi Jagjiwan Das's report to Jai Singh regarding negotiations with the Saiyid brothers in 1713 preceding Husain 'Alī's invasion of Marwar:

(p. 155) سری مهاراجه دھراج مرزا راجه سوای

جے سنگھ جیومد ظلہ العالی

عرضداشت فدوی خانہ زاد پنچپولی جگ جیونداس قواعد تسلیمات و مراسم کورنشات کہ شیوہ خانہ زادان درست اعتقاد است بتقدیم رسا نیدہ بعرض فیض اندوزان حضور لا مع الذور صاحب و قبلہ خدائیکان فیض بخش دو جهان میرساند (p. 156) کہ قبل ازین حقیقت رسیدن عثمان خان قراول و اظهار حقایق زبانی مشارالیه مفصل معروض داشته بعرض عالی رسیدہ با شد سری مهاراج سلامت متی آسوج سدی نومی نواب امیرالامرا بہادر حقایق اظهار زبانی عثمان خان بعرض حضرت ظل سجانی رسا نیدند حضرت شیندہ بسیار برہم و مستاسل شدند نواب قطب الملک و خاندوران بہادر و میر جملہ را طلبیدہ خلوت فرمودند حضرت فرمودند کہ ما می دانستم کہ مرزا راجہ سوای جے سنگھ دراعتقاد بندگی صادق است از اظهار عثمان خان صریح معلوم می شود کہ در اتفاق مهاراجہ اجیت سنگھ است تا این مدت بحکمت عملی دفع الوقت نمودہ برای صوبہ داری گجرات و مالوہ یا مالوہ و برہانپور کہ التماس نمودہ این ممکن شدنی نیست کہ ما ہر دو را بہ یک طرف بفریسم در صورت پذیرائی این التماس باعث برہمزدگی سلطنت است (p. 157) بہ نواب امیرالامرا بہادر فرمودند کہ الحال در کوچ شما تاخیر چیست چنانچہ حضرت برای کوچ نواب امیرالامرا بہادر را تاکید بسیار فرمودند تفصیل طومار فوج ہمراہی نواب امیرالامرا بہادر از فرد جدا گانہ بعرض خواہد رسید - سری مهاراجہ سلامت - برای کوچ نواب امیرالامرا بہادر از پیش گاہ خلافت تاکید بسیار است یقین کہ بعد رمضان کوچ میشود خانہ زاد را نواب صاحب طلبیدہ بمعرفت بہیا تولا رام این تمامی حقایق را گفتند و فرمودند کہ بمضمونے بر نگار کہ اصلاح زبانی تا معلوم نشود و این ممکن نیست کہ ہر دو صاحبان را صوبہ داری یک طرف بشود از راہ خیراندیشی و دولت خواہی

التماس دارد که (p 158) اگر مرضی مبارک با شد و ارشاد گردد برای صوبه داری لاهور یا اوده یا اله اباد یا بنارس ازین صوبه ها یک صوبه بنام مهاراجه اجیت سنگه جیو و صوبه داری مالوه یا برهانپور بنام آن خدارند بعرض نواب صاحب رسانیده شود اما التماس اینست که هرگز اظهار فدوی منکشف نشود - سری مهاراجه سلامت - صورت حال اینجا برین منوال است هرچه مرضی مبارک باشد بزودی ارشاد شود و پروانجات هر یک مطلب جداگانه مرحمت میکرده باشد که بروقت کاربرجسته از نظر نواب صاحب گذرانیده آید نواب صاحب می فرمودند که مامی دانستم که آنچه درمیان ما و میرزا راجه جیو قرارشده دران تفاوت نیست بقول همون که قول مردمان جان دارد اما از اظهار زبانی عثمان خان اصلاح ازین معنی عشر عشیر بظهور نیامد - سری مهاراجه سلامت - سری رانا جیو و سری مهاراجه اجیت سنگه جیو (p. 159) به و کلائی خود نوشته اند که همراه فوج نواب صاحب بیایند - بموجبی که بخانه زاد ارشاد شود بعمل آرد و خانه زاد دهرام از دربار خبردار خواهد بود برائے روانه شدن چون (?) حضرت بسیار بسیار تاکید فرموده اند عنقریب روانه می شود زیاده جرأت حدبندگان نیست - الهمی آفتاب دولت و جاه ابد الدهر از مطاع اقبال و اجلال تابان و درخشان باد برب العباد بتاریخ هفتم رمضان سنه ۲ تحریر یافت فقط -

تفصیل امرایان عظام - (p. 160)

نواب امیر الامرا بهادر - خاندوران بهادر - غازی الدین خان بهادر - افراسیاب خان بهادر بخشی سوم - راجه راج بهادر - راجه پرتاب سنگه - مهاراجه بهیم سنگه - راجه مهاسنگه ولد محکم سنگه -

میر مشرف صوبه دار اله آباد - پسران و نبایران روح الله خان مرحوم - سردار خان و ناهر خان و غیره میواتیان - فتح الله خان و غیره -

فوج قطب الماک - بندھائے والا شاهی - فوج روهله -

تفصیل فوج هندی همراهی نواب امیر الامرا بهادر -

سوار	برقنداز	سرب	باروت	بان
(?) ۲۵۹۵۳ نفر	۲۰۰۰ نفر	۴۰۰ من	۴۰۰ من	۴۰۰۰
توپ کلاں	رهکله
۱۰ ضرب	۲۰۰ ضرب

(Jaipur Records, Sarkar's Collection, vol ii, Sitamau transcript).

APPENDIX C

Documents concerning the early relations of the Rajputs and the Marāthās.

- (a) Yād-dāsht submitted by an anonymous agent, d. S. 1783, Sāwan Sudi 11/July 29, 1726, proposing to settle the Marāthā claim for the chauth of Malwa and Gujarat by assigning them a jāgīr worth 20 lakhs a year in the two ṣūbahs (see Chapter VIII p. 203 above):

श्री रामो जयति

श्री एकलिंगजी

याददास्त

उप्र कागद २ राजरां आया सो कागद १ पहला माँहे समाचार लिख्या था । तारो मतलब तो म्हें अठा थी याददास्त माँहे लिखे । लिख्या पहली ही राज हजूर मोकल्यो है । सो व्यौरो मालुम हुवो है गो ने जठा पाछे कागद १ पाछा थी आयो ती माँहे लिख्यो थो सो तो नी तराय हैं । उठे भोकल्यो है सो वे अठे आया थी समाचार सारा सांभलीं ने पाछो जावसी ताब लिखावांगा । और राजा साहुजीए समाचार लिख्या वा वास्ते हुक्म हुओ सो ऐ समाचार तो जादुराय अठे थी जदी ही ऊणी नेरे लीखाया है न राजरो पण भलो आदमी उठे गयो है । ती हे पण लिखावारो हुक्म है । पण सुरत या है सो दशराना पछे अठे फोज बंदी होगी । ने राज पण पधारोगा सो ईणी तरफ है पधारया पछे राजा साहुजी थी रद बदल करावांगा सो राज पधारया पछे ज्या ही बात करोगा सो ही कबुल करेगा । पहली ही बात करावांगा तो वे जाणोगा सो म्हांथी दव्या थका बात करे है । सो आपे तो ऊणाए बीस लाष रूपयारी दोई सुबा माँहे जागीर देवारी है । सो दोई सुबा माहे रूपया लाख ५० पचासरी पैदायस है । सो या बात किस भांत रेवेगी । तेथो राज अठे पधारया ही ज्या बात वणोगी सो वणोगी पण पहली ही या बात पेस न पोहचेगी राज ने तरदुद कीयो है

सो अवल कीयो है सो श्रीजी' रां प्रताप थी राजरां बोलबाला ही होगी ने आगे बड़ा महाराजा श्री जयसिंहजी दिखयया ऊपे विदा हुआ था जदी सीवेजी ८४ चोरासी गंठारी कूंची आणे मेढां आगे नाखी थी। सो उसा तो ऐन है ने ऊणारा तो वर माँहे हु लेवो हे सो एक राज था तीरा दोय राज हुआ है सो ईणी वातरी तो राज घणी खुश्याली ही रखावसी। या बात पेस ही पोहँचेगी ने इतरो किया वगर पण या बात थाल पड़ेगी नही। ने ईणाए च्यार दिनने हर मिल्या है तो दिन दिन सिर जोर हैगा। तीथो ही बांरुं थी काची वेदम तोड नाखजे सो राज तो दोई जान हो सो ज्या वात करोगा सो अवल ही करोगा ने ही बांरुंरी ज्या तरेनीजर आयी है सो तो राज है लिखी है ने उठारी पातशाह तरफरी कवीश कहै सो। अंजु महकम करे योगाजी और नबाब निजामल मुलकजी है सो अठा थी ही इखलासरो राह राखे है। ने राजरे पण ऊणा थी ही तारया है ने उणा थी कीधी पण अवल है सो इणी बात उपे ऊणारां मनरी वगी सो ये पण कहेगा संवत् १७८३ वष सावण शुदि ११ गुरौ।

(Jaipur Records, Hindi Letters, v 85-6).

1. Srinathji, the patron diety of the house of Mewar, situated in the village of Sihād.

- (b) Jai Singh's memorandum to the Emperor in October 1729 after being appointed the governor of Malwa, setting out the reasons for his advocacy of a peace settlement with the Marāthās (see p. 204 above):—

فدوی درگاه والا برائی تنبیه مرهته صوبه مالوه مامور شده به فضل اله
و اقبال بادشاه به تنبیه انها خواهد پرداخت - تعلق این جماعه از مدت
درین صوبه خجسته بنیاد (?) اند این سال اگر بسبب فوج سنگین دخل نه یافتند
یا به تنبیه بر سیدند هر سال صرف این همه مبلغ خطیر معلوم - لهذا امید وار
است راجه سا هورا که از عهد خلد مکن به شرف بندگی مفاخرت اندوز است
به عطای جاگیر ده لک روپیه بنام کشن سنگه پسرش به شرط عدم شورش در صوبه
مالوه و بودن جمعیت کمکی همراه ناظم آن جا عطا شود که درین صورت ملک
بادشاه محفوظ و مامون خواهد ماند - و هر کفایت در اخراجات فوج کشی
خواهد شد و اگر با وجود آن انحراف خواهد ورزید به سزا خواهد رسید - امید
وار است که اگر با حال قدری کم یا زیاده مقرر شود منظور گردد و به گفته ار باب
عرض نوع دیگر نه شود -

The Emperor wrote in his own hand.

البته منظور خواهد شد به خاطر تجویز نماید

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

(a) SOURCES: PERSIAN

I Chronicles: Mss.

A'zam-ul-Harb.—by Kām Rāj; Rieu iii 937 a, and Sitamau transcript. Account of A'zam's reign.

Bahādur Shāh Nāmah—by Ni'mat Khān 'Ālī; Rampur Library. Official history of first two years of Bahādur Shāh's reign.

Tazkirah or Tārīkh-i-Mubārak Shāhī—by Irādat Khān (Mirza Mubārakullāh); Bankipur vii 579. Completed in 1126H/1714.

Jahāndār Nāmah—by Nūr-ud-Dīn Fārūqī Balkhī Dehlavī Multanī., I.O. 3988. A gossip account of Jahāndār's reign, completed in 1127H/1715, or 1131/1718-19.

Tārīkh-i-Farrukh Siyar—by M. Aḥsan Ijād; Rieu i 273a. Account of Farrukh Siyar's minority till accession on 25 Ṣafar 1125/March 23, 1712. Āshūb (i 8), however, says the account was continued till the 4th year of the reign.

'Ibrat Nāmah—by Mirza Muḥammad Hārisī; Bankipur vii 623. A very useful account upto the deposition of Farrukh Siyar in 1719.

Tārīkh-i-Muḥammadi—by the same author, Bankipur. Chronicle of important events, deaths etc. till 1190/1777.

Tārīkh-i-Shāhanshāhī—by Khwājah Khalīl; National Library, Calcutta. An account upto 1715 by a contemporary observer; used for the first time by the present author.

Aḥwāl-ul-Khawāqīn—by M. Qāsim Aurangābādī; Rieu i 276 b. A history of Aurangzīb's successors upto 1151/1738-39.

Chahār Gulshan—by Chhatarman Rai; Sarkar's Lib. Partly translated by Sarkar in "India of Aurangzeb".

'Ibrat Nāmah—by M. Qāsim Lāhorī; Sarkar's Library and Bankipur. Account of Timurids upto the fall of the Saiyids, written in 1135H/1722-23.

'Ibrat Maqāl; Punjab University Library (Bankipur transcript); another version of the above upto the 3rd yr. of Muḥammad Shāh's reign, with the pro-Saiyid portions deleted.

Tazkirat-us-Salātīn-i-Chughtā'i—by M. Hādī Kāmwar Khān, Sitamau transcript from V.U.L., Udaipur, also Lucknow Pub. Lib., (entitled Tārīkh-i-Mughaliyah). Account of Timurids upto 6th yr. of Muḥammad Shāh's reign—mostly official appointments, transfers etc. only.

ʿIbrat Nāmah—by Kāmraj s/o Nain Singh; Ethe 391. General account from 1707 to 1719.

Mir'āt-i-Wāridāt or Tārīkh-i-Chughtā'i—by Shafī Wārid Tehrānī. General account upto 1734. Bankipur vii 580—part relating to M. Shāh's reign.

Nādir-uz-Zamānī—by Khush-hāl Rai, Khalsa College, Amritsar, transcript of Hyderabad Ms., general history upto 17th yr. of Muḥammad Shāh's reign (1734-35).

Tārīkh-i-Hindī—by Rustam 'Alī Shāhabādī. A General history upto 1153/1740, written in 1154H. Rieu iii 909, Or. 1628.

Tazkirat-ul-Mulūk—by Yahyā Khān; Ethe 409. A general history upto 1149/1736-37.

Shāhnāmah-i-Munawwar-Kalām—by Shiv Das Lakhnavi, B.M. (Rieu i 274, iii 939-8), A.S.B. (Ivanow 25 1/33). Detached historical narratives and Court news relating to Farrukh Siyar's reign and the first 4 yrs. of Muḥammad Shāh's reign; completed on 2 Muḥarram 1209H/July 30, 1794.

Iqbāl-nāmah: author anon. but probably same as above. Author claims to be eye witness of events in 1734; Rampur Lib. A connected history from the begining of Farrukh Siyar's reign upto the 25th yr. of Muḥammad Shāh's reign; with three separate pieces appended at the end:

- I. An account of the rise of the sardars of Amber and Jaipur —upto 1227H/1814;
- II. An account of the war between Ḥusain 'Alī and Dā'ūd Khān in 1715,
- III. The battle between the Marāthās and Aḥmad Shāh at Panipat in 1761.

Tārīkh-i-Shahādāt-i-Farrukh Siyar wa Julūs-i-Muḥammad Shāhī—by Muḥammad Bakhsh "Āshūb"; Sarkar's Lib., written in 1196H/1782. Valuable but chronologically unprecise.

Bayān-i-Wāqī'—by 'Abdul Karīm Kāshmīrī; Sarkar's Lib.

Chahār Gulzār-i-Shujā'ī—by Harcharan Das, Khalsa College, Amritsar.

Hikāyat-i-Fatḥ Nādirī, Anon., A.S.B. Lib..

Jauhar-i-Ṣamṣām—by M. Khān Bijnori; Ivanow 2nd. Supp. 929. Account of Nādir Shāh's invasion and the fight of Khān-i-Daurān.

Tārīkh-i-Fatḥiyah—by Yūsuf M. Khān, Daftar-i-Diwani, Hyderabad. Account of Aṣaf Jāh I in verse.

Tārīkh-i-Ibrāhīmī—by Ibrāhīm Khān; Rampur Lib. Brief account of the Marāthās. (1201H/1786).

Tārīkh-i-Muẓaffarī—by M. 'Alī Khān Muẓaffarī, Allahabad University Library, written in c. 1800.

Tazkirah—by Shākir Khān, Sarkar's Ms.

PRINTED WORKS

Muntakhab-ul-Lubāb—by Khāfī Khān; Bib. Ind. Series.

Ma'āṣir-ul-Umarā—by Shāhnawāz Khān; Bib. Ind.

Mir'āt-i-Aḥmadī—by M. 'Alī Khān; Bib. Ind.

Tārīkh-i-Jahāhkushā-i-Nādirī—by Mirza M. Mahdi; Litho. Tihiran Edition.

Siyar-ul-Muta'akhhirīn—by Ghulam Husain; Litho. Lucknow Edition.

Hadīqat-ul-'Ālam—by Mīr 'Ālam, Litho. Haiderabad Edition.

II Documents, Letters etc.—Mss.

Jaipur Records (Sitamau, Transcripts): classified as Akḥbārāt (Daily Court Reports); Misc. memoranda, reports, farmāns etc., bound as "Miscellaneous Papers" (4 vols.), "Additional Persian Papers" (5 vols.), "Sarkar's Collection" (14 vols.), "Hindi Letters" (3 vols.). The Akḥbārāt virtually end with the deposition of Farrukh Siyar.

Aurangzīb's Letters: Ruqqa'āt-i-Ināyat Khānī (Sarkar's Library), Raqā'im-i-Karā'im (Aligarh University), Aḥkām-i-'Ālamgīrī, ed. by Sarkar.

'Ajā'ib-ul-Afāq—Letters of 'Abdullah Khān, mostly relating to 1712; I.O.L.

Bālmukand Nāmāh—Letters of 'Abdullāh Khān, mostly relating to 1719-20. Mr. S. A. Askari's Ms., Patna, and my copy. Used for the first time by the present author. A very valuable and rare Ms, Khujastāh Kalām, Letters of Muḥammad Khān Bangash, ed. by Sahib Rai ; I.O.L. (Sitamau transcript).

Inshā-i-Gharīb, ed. by Lala Ujagar Chand "Ulfat", Research Society, Patna.

Safīnah-i-Khushgū, Life of poets etc., Bankipur viii 83-115.

Nigār Nāmah-i-Munshī, Aligarh University.

Waqā'i' Sarkar Ranthambor wa Ajmīr, Aligarh University.

Printed and Litho.

Inshā-i-Madho Ram ed. by Madho Ram, Litho., Nawal Kishore.

Khazīnah-i-'Āmirah—by Ghulam 'Alī Āzād, Bib. Ind ; lives of poets, etc.

MARATHI

- |   |   |
|---|---|
| Aitihasik Patra Vyavahar  | Ed. by S. G. Sardesai (2nd. ed.)          |
| Brahmendra Swamichen Charitra   | Ed. by Parasnis.                          |
| Chhratrapati Shahu Maharaj  | Chitnis                                   |
| Hingane Daftar (Vol. I).  | Ed. by Sardesai.                          |
| Kavyetihās Sangraha Patren Yadi   | Ed. by Sardesai and others,1930 ed. , |
| Marathi Itihasanchi Sadhanen(Vols. II, III, IV, VI only).             | Ed. by Rajwade.                           |
| Maratha Wakils  |   |
| Selections from the Peshwas Daftar(Vols. 3, 7-17, 22, 28, 31, 33, 34) | Ed. by S. G. Sardesai.                    |
| Satara Raja and Peshwa's Diary(Vols. i-iii, x)                        | Ed. by G. C. Vad etc.                     |

HINDI

- |                        |   |
|------------------------|---|
| Vamsh Bhaskar          | by Suraj Mal Mishran,In verse. Historically valueless.        |
| Vir VinodVol. iii. | by Kaviraj Shyamal Das, Useful for documents from Udaipur museum. |

ENGLISH

- |   |   |
|---|---|
| Diary of E. Conrad Graaf                        | (Abridged English trans. in Journal of the U.P. Hist. Soc., x pt. i). |
| Early Annals of the English in Bengal (3 vols.) | Ed. by H. R. Wilson   |
| Madras in the Olden Times (vol. ii)             | Ed. by J. Talboys Wheeler, Madras, 1861.                              |

(b) SECONDARY WORKS

- Aziz, A. The Mansabdari System, Lahore 1945.
- Baji Rao Peshwa (Marathi) S.G. Sardesai, Bombay, 1946.
- Banerjee, I.B. Evolution of the Khalsa
Vol. ii, Calcutta 1947.
- Duff, J.G. History of the Marathas
(Vol. I), London 1912 ed.
- Dighe, Dr. V.G. Baji Rao I and Maratha Expansion, Bombay, 1944.
- Elliot & Dowson. History of India (Vols. VII and VIII).
- Faruki, M. Aurangzib and his Times, Bombay, 1935.
- Gribble, J.D.B. History of the Deccan,
(Vol. III), London, 1896.
- Irvine, Sir William Later Mughals (2 vols.), Calcutta, 1922.
- Irvine, Sir William The Army of the Indian Mughals, London, 1903.
- Joshi, V.V. Clash of Three Empires, 1941.
- Khan, Dr. Yusuf Husain Nizamu'l Mulk Asaf Jah I, Mangalore, 1936.
- Keene, H.G. The Fall of the Moghul Empire,
London, 1876.
- Kincaid, C.A. & Parasnis, A History of the Maratha People,
Rai Sahib D.B. Vols. ii, iii, 1922.
- Khosla, R.P. Mughal Kingship and Nobility, Allahabad 1934.
- Kosminski Studies in the Agrarian History of England,
Oxford, 1956.
- Lockhart, L. Nadir Shah, London, 1938.
- Macauliffe M.A. Sikh Religion, 1909, Vols. IV, V.
- Marwar ka Itihas (Hindi) Pt. V.S. Reu, (2 vols.)
- Marathi Riyasat (Marathi) S.G. Sardesai.
- Owen, S.G. The Fall of the Moghul Empire.
London, 1912.
- Qanungo, Dr. K. History of the Jats, Calcutta, 1925.
- Ranade, M.G. Rise of the Maratha Power, Bombay, 1900.
- Rajputana ka Itihas (Hindi) G.S. Ojha.

- Sardesai, Rai Sahib, S.G. New History of the Maratha People, Vol. i, Bombay, 1946, ii, 1948.
- Sarkar, Sir J.N. History of Aurangzeb (Vols. iii-v), Calcutta, 1924.
- do — House of Shivaji, 1940.
- do — Shivaji and His Times, 4th ed. 1948.
- do — Mughal Administration, 1935.
- do — Fall of the Mughal Empire, (Vol. i), 1932.
- do — History of Jaipur (unpublished Ms.).
- Scott, Jonathan History of the Deccan.
- Singh, Prof. Ganda Banda Singh Bahadur.
- Sen, S.N. Administrative System of the Marathas, Calcutta, 1928.
- Sinh, Dr. Raghubir Malwa in Transition, 1936.
- Sinha, H.N. Rise of the Peshwas, Allahabad, 1931.
- Spears, P. Twilight of the Moghuls, Cambridge, 1951.
- Srivastava, Dr. A.L. First two Nawabs of Oudh, 1936.
- Tarikh-i-Sadat Baraha Muzaffar Ali Khan, K.B. Jansath 1910.
(Urdu Ms.).
- Tod, Col. James Annals of Rajasthan, Calcutta, 1916 ed.
- Tara Chand, Dr. Influence of Islam on Indian Culture, Allahabad, 1946.
- Tripathi, Dr. R.P. Some Aspects of Muslim Administration, Allahabad, 1936.

(c) SELECT ARTICLES

Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

- 1878 Bengal Nawabs of Farrukhabad, by Sir William Irvine, pp. 259-383.
- 1897 Hindi Poem by Trilok Das-Text and Translation by Irvine.
- 1900 Jangnamah of Sri Dhar Murli, Text and Translation by Sir William Irvine, pp. 1-30.

Journal of Indian History.

- Vol. xii Ajit Singh, by V. Reu, pp. 85-9.

Journal of the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.

- Vol. XXII      Shivaji's Swarjya, by Purushotam Vikram Mawji, pp. 30-42 (Based on the Persian and Marathi Ms.
"Jabita Swarajya").

Journal of the U.P. Historical Society.

- 1941, 1942      Economic History of India 1600-1800 by Radhakamal Mukerji, pp. 49-69.

Indian Culture.

- 1934-35      History of Abhai Singh of Gujarat from 1730 by his own Letters by Pt. V. S. Reu, p. 239.
1935-36      Sawai Jai Singh by D. C. Sircar, p. 376.

Islamic Culture.

- 1941      Two Historical Letters by Asaf Jah I-Text and translation by Sir J. N. Sarkar, p. 341.
1944      The Mughal Empire and the Middle Class—a Hypothesis, by W. C. Smith, pp. 349-63.
1946      Lower Class Risings in the Mughal Empire, by W. C. Smith, pp. 21-40.
1949      Dhulfiqār Khan Nusrat Jang by Satish Chandra,
pp. 151-61.

Asiatic Miscellany.

- 1885      Letter of Nizam-ul-Mulk to M. Shah after his victory over Mubariz-ul-Mulk—translation by W.
Irvine, pp. 482-93.

Proceedings of the Indian History Congress.

- 1938      Mansabdari under Jahangir, by Dr. B. P. Saxena,
pp. 388-90.
1939      Two letters of Abhai Singh by Pt. V. S. Reu,
pp. 112-14.
1941      Bihar in the First Quarter of the 18th Cent. by Prof.
S. H. Askari, pp. 394-405.

- 1946 Jizyah in the Post-Aurangzib Period, by Satish Chandra.
- 1948 Raja Jai Singh Sawai's Contribution to Imperial Politics, by Satish Chandra, pp. 181-87.

Proceedings of the Indian Historical Records Commission.

1937, '38, '39, '40. Letters of Abhai Singh, by V. S. Reu.
and 1942

- 1940 Some Documents bearing on Imperial Mughal Grants to Raja Shahu (1717-24) by Dr. A. G. Powar, pp. 204-15.
- 1942 "The Death of Aurangzib and After-Two Important Letters" by Dr. A. G. Powar, pp. 336-40.

Sardesai Commemoration Volume.

The Marathas in Malwa 1707-19, by Dr. R. Sinh, pp. 59-72.

Bharat Itihas Sanshodhak Mandal Quarterly.

Vol. xii Article on Pilaji Jadhav's Campaign in Bundelkhand in 1735.

Medieval India Quarterly.

- 1957 Early Relations of Farrukh Siyar and the Saiyid Brothers, by Satish Chandra, pp. 135-46.

CHRONOLOGY

(English dates according to the reformed Gregorian Calendar)

1707	March 3/28 Zīqa'dah 1118	Aurangzīb's death.
	March 17	A'zam leaves for N. India.
	March 22/18 Zilḥijjah	Bahādur Shāh crowned at Jamrud.
	May 8	Shahu leaves A'zam's camp.
	June 18/18 Rabī' I 1119	A'zam defeated at Jaju.
	Nov. 12	Bahādur Shāh leaves for Rajputana.
1708	Jan. 22	Shahu crowned King.
	Feb. 26	Ajit Singh submits to Bahādur Shāh.
	April 30	Ajit Singh and Jai Singh flee from royal camp.
	May 17	Bahādur Shāh crosses Narmada into Deccan.
	Oct. 6	Ajit Singh and Jai Singh restored to their manṣabs .
	end of year	Sikh uprising under Banda.
1709	Jan. 13/3 Zīqa'dah	Kām Bakhsh defeated and killed.
	Dec. 25	Bahādur Shāh re-crosses Narmada into N. India.
1710	March 10	Governor of Burhanpur killed by Marathas.
	May 22	Wazīr K. faujdar of Sirhind, defeated and killed by Sikhs.
	June 22	Rajput Rajas granted interview, peace made.
	Dec. 10	Mughals capture Lohgarh, Banda escapes.

- 1711 Feb. 28 Mun'im Khān, wazīr, dies.
 August Chandrasen Jadhav joins Mughals.
 Oct. 2 Khutbah riot at Lahore.
- 1712 Feb. 27/20 Muḥarram 1124 Bahādur Shāh dies at Lahore.
 March 29/21 Safar Jahāndār Shāh crowned after defeating all rivals.
 April 6/29 Safar Farrukh Siyar crowned at Patna.
 April 7 Jahāndār abolishes jizyah.
 June 22 Jahāndār enters Delhi.
 Sept. 22 Farrukh Siyar leaves Patna.
 Nov. 24 Prize 'Azz-ud-Dīn defeated at Khanwah by Saiyid Brothers.
- 1713 Jan. 11 Jahāndār Shāh defeated at Agra.
 Jan. 16 Jizyah abolished by Farrukh
 Siyar.
 Feb. 12 Farrukh Siyar enters Delhi.
 March 2 Nizām-ul-Mulk appointed Governor of the Deccan.
 Oct. 25 Jai Singh appointed governor of Malwa.
- 1714 Jan. 6 Ḥusain 'Alī leaves for Marwar campaign.
 March Ḥusain 'Alī concludes treaty with Ajit Singh.
 April—May Mīr Jumlah made (absentee)
 Governor of Bengal.
 July 16 Ḥusain 'Alī returns to the Court.
 Sept. 20 Ḥusain 'Alī appointed to Deccan in place of Nizām-ul-Mulk.
 Dec. 16 Mīr Jumlah leaves the Court.
 Dec. 29 Ajit Singh appointed Governor of Gujarat.
- 1715 May 20 Ḥusain 'Alī departs for the Deccan.

	May 23	Jai Singh defeats the Marathas in Malwa.
	July 13	Nizām-ul-Mulk reaches Delhi.
	Sept. 6	Husain 'Alī defeats and kills Dā'ūd K. at Burhanpur.
	Dec. 17	Sikhs surrender at Gurdaspur.
1716	Jan. 16	Mīr Jumlah returns from Bihar.
	June 4	Jai Singh reaches the Court.
	Sept. 25	Jai Singh appointed to lead expedition against Jats.
1717	April	Jizyah re-imposed.
	July	Ajit Singh dismissed from Gujarat.
	July—August	Husain 'Alī begins negotiations with the Marathas.
	Nov.	M. Amīn K. appointed to Malwa in place of Jai Singh.
1718	Feb. 10	Husain 'Alī signs agreement with Marathas.
	April 19	Churaman Jat presented at the Court, peace made.
	July	Farrukh Siyar summons Ajit Singh, Sarbuland K. and Nizām-ul-Mulk.
	Dec. 14	Husain 'Alī leaves Burhanpur for N. India.
1719	Jan. 7	Ajit Singh appointed governor of Gujarat (2nd Governorship).
	Feb. 7	Nizām-ul-Mulk appointed governor of Bihar.
	Feb. 16	Husain 'Alī arrives near Delhi.
	Feb. 28/9 Rabī' II 1131	Farrukh Siyar deposed.
	March	Jizyah abolished.

March	Maratha troops leave for the Deccan.
March 15	Nizām-ul-Mulk leaves for Malwa.
May 18	Nekusiyar proclaimed Emperor at Agra.
June 6/19 Rajab	Rafi'-ud-Daulah succeeds Rafi'-ud-Darjāt as Emperor.
July 8	Siege of Agra commences.
Aug. 12	Agra surrenders.
August	Girdhar Bahadur rebels at Allahabad.
Sept. 28/15 Zīqa'dah	Muḥammad Shāh succeeds Rafi'-ud-Daulah.
Nov. 5	Ajit Singh appointed Governor of Ajmer in addition to Gujarat.
1720 April	Balaji Vishwanath dies, Baji Rao appointed Peshwa.
May 8	Nizām-ul-Mulk crosses Narmada into the Deccan, begins rebellion.
May 11	Girdhar Bahadur evacuates Allahabad.
June 19	Nizām-ul-Mulk defeats Dilāwar 'Alī Khān.
Aug. 9	Nizām-ul-Mulk defeats 'Alam 'Alī Khān.
Oct. 8	Husain 'Alī assassinated.
Nov. 13	'Abdullāh Khān defeated.
Dec. 3/2 Safar	Nizām-ul-Mulk issues sanad for chauth and sardeshmukhi of Deccan.
Dec. 25	M. Amīn K.'s attempt to revive jizyah fails.
1721 Jan. 14	Nizām-ul-Mulk meets Baji Rao at Chikhalthan.

	Jan. 27	M. Amīn K., wazīr , dies.
	May	Ajit Singh removed from Gujarat and Ajmer—first uprising.
	Oct. 21	Nizām-ul-Mulk leaves Aurangabad for Delhi.
1722	Jan.	Ajit Singh withdraws from Ajmer.
	Jan. 29	Nizām-ul-Mulk reaches Delhi.
	March 21	Envoys of Ajit reach Delhi for submission.
	April 1	Haider Qulī leaves for Gujarat.
	April 19	Jai Singh appointed for expedition against Jats.
	Sept. 1	Sa'adat Khān appointed Governor of Awadh.
	Nov.—April 1723	Baji Rao raids Malwa.
	Nov. 11	Nizām-ul-Mulk leaves for Gujarat.
	Nov. 18	Fall of Jat strong-hold, Thun.
1723	Jan. 6	Ajit Singh commences second uprising.
	March	News received of fall of Isfahān to Gilza'īs on Oct. 22.
	Feb. 23—March 1	Nizām meets Baji Rao at Bolasha near Jhabua.
	May	Nizām assumes charge of Malwa also.
	July 3	Nizām returns to Delhi.
	August	Ajit Singh submits again.
	Dec.	Nizām departs from Delhi.
1724	Jan.	Baji Rao enters Malwa again.
	Feb. 3	Mubārīz Khān appointed to Deccan in place of Nizām.
	May 28	Nizām meets Baji Rao at Nalcha.

May—June	Nizām reaches Burhanpur.
June 7	Abhai Singh succeeds Ajit Singh.
July 22	Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān appointed wazīr .
Oct. 11/23 Muḥarram 1137	Nizām defeats Mubārīz Khān at Shakar Khera.
1725 June	Girdhar Bahadur appointed to Malwa.
June 20	Nizām pardoned, granted title of Āṣaf Jāh.
Nov.—May 1726	Baji Rao's first expedition into Karnatak.
1726 May 3/1 Ramāḡan 1138	Sarbuland agrees to chauth and sardeshmukhi of Gujarat for the year.
Nov.—April 1727	Baji Rao's second expedition into Karnatak.
1727 Feb.	M. Khān Bangash invades Bundelkhand.
March 2	Sarbuland signs pact for chauth of Gujarat with Chimnaji.
Aug.—Feb. 1728	War between Nizām and the Marathas.
1728 March 6	Nizām signs treaty with Baji Rao at Mungi Shivgaon.
June	M. Khān Bangash besieges Chhatrasāl at Jaitpur.
Oct.—May 1729	Chimnaji invades Malwa and Bundelkhand.
Dec. 9	Girdhar Bahadur and Daya Bahadur killed at Amjhara.
1729 March	Shoe Sellers' Riot at Delhi.
March—June	Baji Rao meets Chhatrasal, M. Khān Bangash besieged.

	Oct.	Jai Singh appointed to Malwa (2nd governorship).
1730	April 2	Sarbuland signs pact for chauth of Gujarat.
	May	Abhai Singh appointed Governor of Gujarat.
	Sept. 29	M. Khān Bangash replaces Jai Singh in Malwa.
	Oct.	Nizām approaches Dabhade for joint action against Baji Rao.
1731	Feb.	Abhai Singh meets Baji Rao, signs pact for chauth .
	end of March	Nizām and M. Khān Bangash confer.
	April 11	Baji Rao defeats Dabhade at Dabhoi.
	Dec. 24	Chhatrasāl Bundela dies.
1732	April 2	Abhai Singh slays Pilaji Gaekwar.
	July	Peshwa divides Malwa between Sindhia, Holkar and Pawar.
	Early half	Fall of royal favourites at the Court.
	Oct. 8	Jai Singh appointed governor of Malwa (3rd governorship).
	Oct.	Bundelas assign jāgīr to Mara- thas, sign offensive and defen- sive pact.
	Nov.—May 1733	First Imperial campaign to clear Malwa.
	Dec.	Nizām and Baji Rao meet at Rohe Rameshwar.
1733	Early part	Chimnaji in North India.
	Feb.	Umabai besieges Ahmadabad, Abhai Singh withdrawn from Gujarat.
	March	Jai Singh besieged at Mandsaur, gives chauth for the year.

	Oct.—May 1734	Holkar invades Rajputana, Pilaji levies chauth in Bundelkhand.
	Oct.	Muzaffar Khān advances upto Sironj.
1734	Oct.—May 1735	Sindhia and Holkar raid Malwa, Pilaji in Bundelkhand.
	do.	Grand Imperial effort to oust Marathas.
1735	April 3	Khan-i-Dauran signs pact for chauth with Holkar.
	Oct.	Peshwa leaves for N. India.
1736	Feb. 26	Nādir ascends throne of Persia.
	March 14	Peshwa meets Jai Singh in Rajputana.
	March—May 1737	Peace negotiations with Baji Rao.
	May	Peshwa returns to Deccan.
	Oct.	Peshwa leaves for N. India again.
1737	March 3	Nādir Shāh invests Qandhar.
	March 12	Sa'adat Khān repulses Holkar's raid into Dū'āb.
	April 9	Baji Rao appears at the gates of Delhi.
	April 17	Nizām leaves Burhanpur for N. India.
	July 12	Nizām reaches Delhi.
	Dec. 16	Nizām besieged at Bhopal.
1738	Jan. 7	Nizām accepts Baji Rao's terms.
	March 12	Fall of Qandhar.
	June 19	Fall of Kabul.
	Dec. 12	Nādir Shāh crosses Indus.
1739	Jan. 12	Fall of Lahore.
	Feb. 13	Battle of Karnal.
	March 3	Nādir Shāh enters Delhi.
	May 1	Nādir Shāh leaves Delhi.

ERRATA

Page	line	for	read
1, note		'Abbarī	'Abbāsī
15, para 2	7	through	though
47, para 2	11	Amīn	Aḥmad
49	3	Dec. 1711	March 1710
158, note 49,	8	hamchān	hamchūn
162	10	Agra	Delhi
198, para 2	1	1733	1732
206, para 2	4	delete "in April 1730"
217, note 98		xiii 9	xiv 9
218	2	1731	1732
237, note 68	4	barāti	barāi
240	5	('Fall' 11 i	('Fall' i
248	8	'Abdās	'Abbās
249	3 from below	1737	1738
265	13	tack	rack

INDEX

A

- 'Abdul Ghafūr Bohra, question of escheat of the property of 165 n, 171.
- 'Abdul Ghafūr (Shāh), a faqir, joins plot against Husain 'Alī, interferes in administration 212-213; fall from power 214.
- 'Abdul Hai Bohra, son of 'Abdul Ghafur 171.
- 'Abdullāh Khān Saiyid Miyān, father of 'Abdullāh Khān 87.
- 'Abdullāh Khān, Saiyid (Qutb-ul-Mulk). Antecedents and early career 86-88; appointed deputy governor of Allahabad 89; seizes convoy of treasure, removed from post, joins Farrukh Siyar 94-95; claims post of wazīr 95-96; attempts to conciliate old nobles, especially M. Amin K., Nizam-ul-Mulk 96-98; abolishes jizyah 98 n; attitude to Rajputs 101; writes to Husain 'Ali regarding Emperor's intrigues 101; opposed by personal favourites of King, resents their interference, role of Ratan Chand 103-109; prepares for show-down 111 n; position after departure of Husain 'Ali for Deccan and of Mir Jumlah for Bihar 115-116; continues to face opposition of Emperor and of M. Amin K., and Nizam, the force at his disposal 117-118; return of Mir Jumlah, recommends his case 119; grants diwani of Bengal etc. to English 120; opposes Jat campaign of Jai Singh 124; peace concluded with Jats at his instance 125; neglects administration, opposes re-imposition of jizyah and other reforms of 'Inayatullah K. 127-128; Emperor's attempt to imprison, recruits fresh troops 134-135; wins over Nizam-ul-Mulk, Sarbuland K., Ajit Singh and M. Amin K. 136-137, 164; asks Husain 'Ali to return to Delhi 139; attitude to Farrukh Siyar—opposes deposition 138; imprisons Farrukh Siyar, 141, 163; blames Husain 'Ali for deposition 142; favours proposal to accept Neku Siyar as Emperor 146; his political difficulties—attempt to consolidate alliance of Rajputs, Marathas and old nobles 147-150; struggle for power with Husain 'Ali 151; differences over attitude to old nobles and Nizam-ul-Mulk 152; M. Amin Khan spared at his instance 158-159; favours accommodation with Nizam-ul-Mulk 159, 160; raises Ibrahim K. to throne after assassination of Husain 'Ali, defeated and taken prisoner 161, 162; character and administration 165; significance of his wizarat 165-167; concluding remarks 257-261.
- 'Abd-un-Nabī Khān, fights Marathas 49.
- 'Abduṣ-Ṣamad Khān, Early career 68 n; appointed Sadr with the rank of 7,000/68; intercedes with Asad Khan on behalf of Chin Qulich Khan 76-77; Saiyids give him rank of 7000/7000 and governorship of Lahore 97-98; opposes Saiyids along with Nizam-ul-Mulk and M. Amin Khan 114; retains the governorship of Lahore after down-fall of Saiyids 168; opposes Nizam-ul-Mulk's scheme to reimpose jizyah 175, 183; death, succeeded by son, Zakariyah K., 185.
- Abhai Singh (son of Ajit Singh), sent to court with Husain 'Ali (1714) 101; raids Imperial territory 180; sent to court after peace in 1724-25, 182; succeeds Ajit Singh with rank

- of 7000|7000 and title of Rajab-i-Rajeshwar 182; desires to carve out independent principality 186-187 n; appointed governor of Gujarat 206, 215; agreement with Baji Rao for chauth and sardeshmukhi, opposes policy of alliance with Nizam 197, 206-207; withdraws to Jodhpur 207; arrives at court, befriends the Wazir, Qamar-ud-Din K., 223; joins him and others in resisting Marathas 224, 226, 231.
- Abwāb* (illegal cesses, also see rahdārī) xiv n, 82 n, pilgrim tax 99, 131n, in Gujarat 138n.
- Adaru, Zamindar, fight of Sa'adat K. and Qamar-ud-Dīn with 208n, 210.
- Afghans Position in nobility, xxvii-xxviii.
- Growth of power 187, 209.
- and Nadir Shah 243-244, 247-248.
- Afzal Khān, tutor of Farrukh Siyar, dispute regarding his appointment 103, 104.
- Agra, occupied by 'Azīm-ush-Shān 15; battle of between Jahandar Shah and Farrukh Siyar 84; Neku Siyar's rebellion at and siege of by Saiyids 145-146.
- Aḥmad Khān, Mīr, Governor of Burhanpur, killed fighting Marathas, 49.
- Aḥmad Sa'īd (Husain K.) Bārāha, appointed faujdar of Amber, 30, 31, 35.
- Aḥmad Shāh, Prince 251.
- Aḥsan Khān (Mīr Malang), given samad of sardeshmukhi, xxxviii, appointed with Kam Bakhsh 11.
- Ajit Singh, promised mansab and raj by Aurangzīb xxxiii; given title of Maharaja, mansab of 7000|7000 and governorship of Gujarat by A'zam Shah 20, 29, 73; reoccupies Jodhpur 29; Bahadur Shah's expedition against 29-30; peace made, given mansab of 3500|3000 and title of Maharaja, but Jodhpur re-occupied, kept under semi-captivity 32-34; escapes, and renews war 34-35; peace concluded, mansab and homeland restored 36; dissatisfied, wants subahdari of Gujarat and high mansab 37, serves against Sikhs, granted faujdarī of Sorath, returns home 38-39.
- Raised to mansab of 7000|7000, granted subahdari of Gujarat by Zu'lfiqar K. 74; summoned for help against Farrukh Siyar 84n; submits to Farrukh Siyar 99; granted rank of 7000|7000 and governorship of Thatta, asks for Gujarat, Emperor decides on war 100-101; Husain 'Ali's campaign, Farrukh Siyar's secret letter, secret pact with Husain 'Ali, 101-102; daughter married to Farrukh Siyar 102; Farrukh Siyar opposes the pact, delays appointment to Gujarat 110; recalled to court, attempt of Farrukh Siyar to enlist against Saiyids 134, 135n; dismissed from Gujarat for oppression 137n, 179; advises deposition of Farrukh Siyar 139, 141; pelted with stones by Delhi populace 164n; appointed Governor of Gujarat and Ajmer after deposition, his influence 145, 147, 148; attempts to mediate between Jai Singh and Saiyids 148-149, 158n; does not help Saiyids in their hour of need 166; shelters Mukham Singh Jat 178, removed from Gujarat after fall of Saiyids, but allowed to retain Ajmer 179, Court discusses plan of campaign against 180-181; murders newly appointed diwan of Ajmer, Imperial campaign against 181; submits 182; murdered 182.
- Ajit Singh, son of Guru Govind 75.
- Akbar (Emperor) attitude to zamin-dars xv, xxiii; to regional sentiments xvi-xvii; his organisation of the nobility xxi-xxiii; Rajput policy xxiv.
- Akbar (prince) 10n, 24, 243.
- Akbar (fictitious prince) 139.
- Aku Ghorpādē, raids Karnatak 49.
- 'Alam 'Alī, Saiyid, deputy of Husain 'Ali in the Deccan 149, 150, 152, 156, 159, 160, 161, 166.

- ‘Ālamgīr—see under Aurangzīb.
- ‘Ālam Shaikh, grand-father of Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang, 7.
- Alāwal Khān, nephew of Dā‘ūd Khān Pannī 48.
- ‘Alī Mardān Khān Shāmlū, agent of Nādir Shāh to Delhi 247.
- ‘Alī Tabār, son of ‘Aẓīm-ush-Shān 69.
- Allahabad, governorship of ‘Abdullāh K. 93-94; of Sarbuland K. 135n; rebellion of Chhabelā Ram and siege of by Saiyids 146-147.
- Amānat K. diwan of the Deccan 44n.
- Amar Singh II (Rana of Udaipur) alleged secret treaty with Bahadur Shah in 1681 for abolition of jizyah etc. 23, 33n; cooperates with Jai Singh 30; averts threatened invasion of his country by sending his brother to wait upon Bahadur Shah 32, agreement with Ajit Singh and Jai Singh to fight Mughals 34; imperial grant of palkis and ‘Arabi and ‘Iraqi horses to 56n.
- Amīn-ud-Dīn Sambhalī, imprisoned after accession of Jahandar 78n; advises Farrukh Siyar to resist Saiyids 140n; his property etc. confiscated after the deposition of Farrukh Siyar 144.
- Amīr—definition xxii (see under nobility).
- Amīr Khān, governor of Kabul 242.
- Amīr Khān, (‘Ālamgīrī) 78n, 144.
- Amīr Khān, M. Shāh’s favourite 230.
- Amjad Khān, Saiyid, promised post of Sadr by ‘Abdullah K. 103.
- Anup Singh, diwan of Ajit Singh 170n.
- Anwar Khān, Saiyid, adviser of S. Husain ‘Alī 130.
- Anwārullāh K., joins Nizām-ul-Mulk 157.
- Asadullāh Khān, S. uncle of Abdullah K. 113n.
- Asad Khān, Wazīr-al-Mamālīk: ancestry 1; made wazīr by Aurangzib 2; recommended to sons 2; proceeds to Jinji 3; favours A‘zam 11, 12; not keen to take part in civil war 13; left at Gwalior with ladies etc. 16; Bahadur Shah sends letter of reassurance 24; arrives at court, claims wizarat 25, made Wakil-i-Mullaq 25, 26; leaves for Delhi 27; ordered to repress Rajput uprising 35; negotiates with Rajputs 35, 36; ordered to march against Sikhs 51; revival of claim for wazīr’s office 54; position under Jahandar Shah 67, 68; jizyah abolished at his instance 74; helps Chin Qulich 77; disgraced by Farrukh Siyar 96, 97, 106.
- Āṣaf Khān (Yamīn-ud-Daulah) 25, 26, 95n.
- Āṣaf Jāh (see under Nizām-ul-Mulk).
- Aurangzīb (also ‘Ālamgīr) and Jats xxx; and Satnamis xxx, xxxi; and Sikhs xxxi; and Marathas xxxiii—xxxviii, xlii; and Deccan problem xxxvi—xxxvii, xliv; financial reforms xli; situation of empire at death xliii-xliv 14, 18n, 109; attitude towards Shi‘ism and Iranis xxix, 89; parties among nobles towards the end of reign 1-10; attitude towards sons and grand-sons 10, 11, 15, 23, 55n, 64; scheme of partition of empire 11, 25, 40, 41; death 12; position of wazīr under 61-62; opinion regarding Baraha Saiyids 87-88; gradual abandonment of his Rajput, Maratha and Hindu policies, by Bahadur Shah 39, 49, 56-57, by Zu‘lfiqar Khan 21, 74, 85, and by the Saiyid Brothers 98-100, 129; attempt of Nizam-ul-Mulk to revive partially 162, 174, fails 175; lessons 183.
- Ayā Mal, Maratha wakil, 75, 225n.
- A‘zam Khān, brother of Kokaltāsh Khān, 69.
- A‘zam Shāh, at siege of Bijapur 7; wins over Asad and Zu‘lfiqar Khan 11; clashes with Kam Bakhsh 11; ascends throne after death of Aurangzib, prepares for civil war 12-13; attitude of leading nobles 12-13; suspected of Shi‘ite tendencies 13n; financial and other difficulties 14-15; battle of Jaju 16-17;

makes large concessions to Rajput and Marathas at instance of Zu'lfiqar Khan 18-21.

'Azīmullāh Khān, fights Marathas 219, 220.

'Azīm-ush-Shān, second son of Bahādūr Shāh, sovereignty forecast for him while governor of Bengal 90; recalled by Aurangzib from Patna before his death 15; reaches Agra first 15; Jai Singh and Ajit Singh seek his mediation 35; peace restored at his instance 36, 37; becomes centre of all affairs 38; offered Viceroyalty of Deccan after defeat of Kam Bakhsh, prefers Bengal, Bihar Orissa and Allahabad 42n, 43, 88; appoints Husain 'Ali his deputy in Bihar, and 'Abdullah Khan in Allahabad 89; influence of Mir Jumla over 104; attitude towards question of wizarat after death of Mun'im Khan 53-54; rift with Zu'lfiqar Khan 55; other princes organise against him 64; his wealth 60, 80n; rejects Zu'lfiqar's attempt at compromise regarding succession 65; attitude towards Zu'lfiqar's scheme of partition of empire 67; Civil War at Lahore, stands on defensive in expectation of reinforcements, defeated 66-67; uprising of his son, Farrukh Siyar (q.v.), against Jahandar Shah 84, 91.

A'zz-ud-Dīn (prince) leads army against Farrukh Siyar 76, 77; his flight from Khanwah 83.

B

Badan Singh (Jat) succeeds Churaman, growth of Jat power under 178.

Bahādūr Khān (Ranmast Khan), uncle of Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, 5.

Bahramand Khān, Mīr Bakhshī of Aurangzib, 4.

Bahādūr Shāh (Prince Mu'azzam, Shāh 'Alam) Early life 10n, 22n-23; released and appointed Governor of Kabul 23, 242-243; prepares for civil war 15-16, 23; war with A'zam 16-17; appointments etc. 24-28; Rajput policy of 29-39; war with Kam Bakhsh 41-42; administrative arrangements for Deccan 43-44; Maratha relations of 45-49; criticism 49; operations against Sikhs 50-53; controversy regarding appointment of wazir after death of Mun'im Khan 54-55; General policy and administration—cautious departure from policies of Aurangzib, breach with orthodox elements, jizyah etc. enforced 56-57; neglect of administration 57; deterioration in financial situation, worsening of crisis of jagirdari system 57-60; estimate 60; position of wazir under 62-63; civil war among sons 64-67.

Baji Rao (Peshwa), helps 'Alam 'Ali against Nizām-ul-Mulk 160; his advice rejected by 'Alam 'Ali 161n, 166; first meeting with Nizam (1721) 169, invades Malwa, second meeting with Nizam, 172-173; helps Nizam against Mubariz K. 177; appointed Peshwa 189; controversy with Pratinidhi regarding Maratha expansion and North India 190-192; war with Nizam-ul-Mulk, treaty of Shivgaon (1728) 191-195; organises systematic raids into Malwa and Gujarat, and demands chauth 196-199; defeats Girdhar Bahadur at Amjhara, raids Bundelkhand 199; early relations with Jai Singh Sawai 201-203; treaty with Abhai Singh for chauth of Gujarat 206-207; agreement with Bundelas 207-208; renewed hostility of Nizam (1729) 196, 205n, 215-216; third secret meeting with Nizam 216; sounds Northern powers regarding peace, invited by Jai Singh for peace talks 224, 240-241; arrives in Rajputana, meets Jai Singh 225; peace negotiations (1736) 226-229; returns to Deccan due to failure of negotiations 229; raids Du'ab and Delhi 230-232; renewed struggle with Nizam, battle of Bhopal 233-237; prepares to resist Nadir Shah,

- instructed to help Emperor 237; sends nazr to Nadir Shah 237; proposes united front of Indian powers under Emperor to oppose foreigners 237; nature of his ambitions 191-192, 230, 237, 238n.
- Bakht Singh, brother of Rana of Mewar, sent to Bahādūr Shāh 32.
- Bakht Singh, kills his father, Ajit Singh 206.
- Baji Bhivrao, presents demands of Baji Rao to Emperor 226.
- Balaji Baji Rao—raids Malwa, peace made by Emperor, Malwa and Gujarat ceded 238.
- Balaji Vishwanath (Peshwa) 48, helps Husain 'Alī 132, 139, 201; demands chauth of Malwa and Gujarat 155; 196; Saiyids ask for help against Nizam 159; settlement of chauth etc. 188-189.
- Banda, the false guru, uprising under 36, 38; founds first Sikh state, its character 50-53; suppressed 98.
- Bāqī Khān, commandant of Agra fort, submits to Shah 'Alam 15, 16.
- Bhajja (father of Churaman Jat) 122.
- Bhimsen, historian 17n.
- Bhim Singh Hara (son of Ram Singh) granted Bundi by Husain Ali 121, displaced to placate Jai Singh 124, advises deposition of Farrukh Siyar 139, restored to Bundi 140.
- Bhopal, battle and treaty of 234-236.
- Bidar Bakhi (Prince) 8, 15, 17, 20, 200.
- Bihari Das, Jaipur wakil, advises 'Abdullāh Khān to abolish jizyah 98n.
- Bijai Singh, see Vijay Singh.
- Bishan Singh Kachhawaha xxx.
- Budh Singh Hara—displaced from zamindari of Bundi (1706) 5, 31n; sides with Bahadur Shah at Jaju, granted 54 forts including Kotah 121; sent to Jodhpur to reassure Ajit Singh 32; alienates Saiyids, removed from Bundi 121; seeks intercession of Jai Singh 122; comes to court with Jai Singh, restored to Bundi 123, 124; defeated by Bhim Singh and displaced from Bundi 140.
- Buland Akhtar, Prince 131.
- Burhān-ul-Mulk, see Sa'adat Khān.

C

Chhabelā Ram Nagar, antecedents and early career 104n; jizyah abolished by Farrukh Siyar at his instance 98n; appointed Diwan-i-Khalisah wa Tan 103, appointed governor of Agra 104; fails in campaign against Jats 123; remains hostile to Saiyids after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 145; uprising at Allahabad 146; negotiations with Saiyids 146; dies 147.

Chauth: Origin xxxv; attitude of Aurangzib towards xxxvii, xxxixn; did A'zam concede chauth of Deccan? 18-20; Shahu's petition for chauth of Deccan rejected by Bahadur Shah 45-46; Da'ud's pact for chauth of Deccan 48, 49; Husain 'Alī's pact 131-132; confirmed by Emperor 149; nature of chauth under Peshwas 188-189, 196-199 (see also under Marathas).

Chandrasen Jādhav 47; joins Mughals 48, 75n; fights Marathas 130.

Chhatrasal Bundela: Remains a royal feudatory during reign of Bahadur Shah, asked to join Prince A'zz-ud-din in campaign against Farrukh Siyar 76; serves Jai Singh against Marathas in Malwa, summoned to court by Farrukh Siyar (Sept. 1715) 123; attacked by M. Khan Bangash 209; summons Marathas to his help, agrees to annual tribute 207; active alliance with Marathas till death (1731) 207.

Chimnaji Appa, brother of Baji Rao, 219, 227n, 230n, 231, 233, 234n, 235.

Chīn Qulīch K. (Nizām-ul-Mulk) Antecedents and early career xxxvii, 8; raised to 5000/5000 (1705) 8; rivalry with Zu'lfiqar K. 10; raised to 7000/7000 and made governor of Khandesh by A'zam Shah, abandons him 12; plunders near Aurangabad 13; invited to court by Bahadur Shah 24; raised to 6000/6000, and made Governor Awadh, resigns, raised to 7000/7000 27; resigns again 28; won over by 'Azim-ush-Shan 76; Zu'lfiqar desires to crush him, 'Abdus-Samad K. intervenes 76-77; granted rank of 5000 and subahdari of Malwa, resigns 77; insulted by La'l Kunwar, Zu'lfiqar K. helps him 77; re-employed and given mansab of 7000, asked to help in checking Farrukh Siyar 77; remains neutral in battle with Farrukh Siyar 84 (See under Nizam-ul-Mulk for later career).

Churman Jat, obtains the rank of 1500/500, sides with 'Azim-ush-Shan at the battle of Lahore, takes part in Sikh campaign 122; promises to help Jahandar against Farrukh Siyar, loots both sides during the battle 76, 122-123; tacit support by Saiyids, gradually falls out of royal favour, Jai Singh's campaign against 123-124; peace made through Asadullah Khan 125; further concessions by Saiyids after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 150, 158n; helps Saiyids in battle of Hasanpur 161, 177; defeats and kills deputy of Sa'adat Khan 178; dies 178.

D

Dabhade (Trimbakrao) Senapati 197, 198, 207, 216, 237.
 (Rao) Dalpat Bundela, lieutenant of Zu'lfiqar K. 4-5, 6n, 12, 18.
 Dānīshmand Khān (Nī'mat Khān 'Alī), historian 17n, 42n.
 Dārā (prince) 11, 12, 17.
 Dā'ūd Khān Pannī, a Deccani Afghan, son of a merchant, chief lieutenant of Zu'lfiqar Khan 5; raised to the rank of 6000/6000 in 1704 6; said to favour Hindus and to keep Hindu idol in house 6; opposes Kam

Bakhsh in Karnatak 42; appointed deputy to Zu'lfiqar Khan as Viceroy of the Deccan with rank of 7000/5000 and the governorship of Bijapur, Berar and Aurangabad 43; Hiranman his deputy 47, 67; makes private pact with Shahu for chauth of Deccan 48-49, 74; leaves all power in the hands of Deccani Brahmins 82; transferred to Gujarat by Farrukh Siyar 97; appointed his deputy in the Deccan by Husain Ali 110; instructed by Emperor to oppose Husain 'Ali, defeated and killed 114; Nizam not responsible for his appointment 115n.

Dayā Ram, killed with Girdhar Bahādūr at Amjhara 199.

Dhānājī Jādav xxxviii, 3, 4.

Dilāwar 'Alī Khān, bakhshi of S. Husain 'Alī 146n, 156, 159, 160.

Diler Khān, fights Marathas in Karnatak 49.

Diyānat Khān Khwāfī, (son of Amānat K., entitled Amānat K.) diwan of Zu'lfiqar K. in the Deccan, 44n, dies 134.

Diyānat Khān (or Dī'ānat K.) son of the above. Appointed deputy to his father 44n; warns Nizam-ul-Mulk about Saiyid intentions, 157; a well-wisher of the Saiyids 160.

Dost M. Khan, Nawab of Bhopal 173.
 Durgadas 32, 123.

Durjan Sal of Kotah 220.

F

Fakhr-ud-Daulah, brother of Roshan-ud-Daulah, 198n, 213n.

Farrukh Siyar Early life 89; proclaims 'Azīm-ush-Shān as King 90; early relations with Husain 'Ali 90-92; abolishes jizyah while in Bihar 93; joined by 'Abdullah Khan 94; continued suspicion of Saiyids 95; defeats prince A'zz-ud-Din 82-83, defeats Jahandar Shah 84; appointments etc. 96-98; imprisons Asad K. and executes Zu'lfiqar K. against advice of Saiyids 96; confirm abolition of jizyah 98; attitude towards Rajputs 99-101; intrigues with Ajit Singh against Saiyids 101; causes of conflict with Saiyids—struggle for power, divergent outlook regarding role of wazīr, administrative incompetence of Saiyids, role of favourites 102-110; first trial of strength, its results 111-114; instructs Da'ud Khan to oppose Husain 'Ali 114; continues intrigues against 'Abdullah Khan 117; disgraces Mir Jumlah on his return to Delhi, 118-119; attempts to use Jai Singh to oppose Saiyids and to crush Jats 121, 123, 124; forced to conclude peace with Jats—further straining of relations with the Saiyids 125; attempts to rally old nobles, appoints 'Inayatullah K., re-imposes jizyah 126-127; intrigues against Husain 'Ali in Deccan 130; opposes Husain 'Ali's pact with Marathas 132; attempts to check Husain 'Ali from marching to Delhi 132-134; attempts to arrest 'Abdullah Khan, summons Nizam, Sarbuland and Ajit Singh 134; his isolation 136-137; events leading to his deposition 138-142; killed 142; the deposition discussed 163-165.

Fazlullāh Khān, bakhshi of Burhanpur 134.

Fīrūz Jang (See Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang).

G

Ganga, a Maratha sardar dismissed by Fīrūz Jang, creates disturbances in Burhanpur and Malwa 47.

Gaj Singh, at the siege of Thūn 124.

Ghairat Khān, Saiyid, appointed governor of Agra 144n.

Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān, son of Nizām-ul-Mulk, appointed subahdar of Gujarat 174.

Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Khān Aḥmad Beg, earliest supporter of Farrukh Siyar, 91, 93, 95, 144, 162.

Ghāzī-ud-Dīn Fīrūz Jang: Power and influence of his group towards the end of Aurangzīb's reign 6-9; raised to 7000|7000 and made Sipah Salar 7; his artillery 7-8; patronises Turanis 9; becomes blind 11; his strained relations with son, Chin Qulich 11; refuses to march with A'zam in civil war, appointed viceroy of Deccan 13; appointed governor of Gujarat by Bahadur Shah, afraid of coming to the court 24, 28; ordered to repress Rajputs, dies 36.

Ghorpade, Aku, raids Karnatak 49.

Ghorpade, Santaji 3, 48.

Girdhar Bahādūr—nephew of Chabelā Ram, continues rebellion against Saiyids at Allahabad 146-147; appointed governor of Awadh 147; opposes move of M. Amin Khan to reimpose jizyah 169; succeeds Nizam-ul-Mulk as governor of Malwa (1722) 172; removed by Nizam 173; with Jai Singh in Jat campaign, proceeds against Ajit Singh 181; appointed governor of Malwa again (1725), fights Marathas 198; defeated and killed at Amjhara 199.

Gulab Chand Karori Sair, 137n.

Guru Govind, dies 50, 52, 53.

Gūjar Mal, diwan-i-khalisah, dies 176.

H

Hāfiẓ Ādam, follower of Sh. Aḥmad Sirhindī, helps Sikhs xxxi.

Haibat Rao Nimbālkar, Maratha sardar, invades Bijapur 47.

Haider Qulī Khān, early career 170-171, 170n, 108n, 110n, 159, 161, 168; raised to rank of 8000|7000 and appointed (absentee) governor of Gujarat for his part in fall of Saiyids 171; Nizam-ul-Mulk resents his interference, sent to assume personal charge of Gujarat, accused of violating royal privileges, expedition of Nizam against 172-173; appointed to lead campaign against Ajit Singh 180, 181.

Hakīm-ul-Mulk, chief adviser of Jahān Shāh, imprisoned 78n.

Hāmid Khān Bahādūr, brother of Nizam-ul-Mulk, 6, 8, 9n, 10, 174, 186n.

Hamid-ud-Dīn Khān ('Ālamgiri) 17, 41n, 79n.

Hamilton, Dr. 120

Hanumant, a Maratha sardar, 87.

Hāshim 'Alī Khān, adviser of Husain 'Alī, favours deposition of Farrukh Siyar 141.

Hidāyat Kesh, Wāqa' Nigār Kul, imprisoned 78n, 107.

Hidāyatullāh Khān, (see Sa'dullāh K.)

Himmat Khān Bārāha, Saiyid, appointed ataliq of Emperor 148.

Hindu-Pad-padshahi—and Marathas 203, 230, 262.

Hindustanis—definition xxv, xxvii; character of xxxix; soldiers 118n, 211, 276; in the administrative services, oppose jizyah, 127-128; and Saiyids 153; relations with Mughals etc. during the period, 244-246.

Hiraman, deputy of Dā'ūd Khān in the Deccan 47-48.

Hiradesa, son of Chhatrasal Bundela, 208.

Holkar (Yashwantrao), lieutenant of Bājī Rao 218, 219, 220, 231, 232, 234n.

Husain Khān, Saiyid, governor of Ajmer, 215.

Husain 'Alī, Saiyid (Amīr-ul-Umarā, Mīr Bakshī). Antecedents 86-87; early career 87-88, 82; appointed deputy governor of Allahabad by 'Azim-ush-Shan 88; strained relations with Farrukh Siyar in Bihar 89, 90; opposes proclamation of 'Azim-ush-Shan as King 90; motives for joining Farrukh Siyar 91-92; mutual suspicions continue 92-95; abolishes jizyah 93; joins attempt to conciliate old nobles 97-98; Rajput policy of 98-100; leads expedition against Ajit Singh, private pact with him 101-102; causes of differences with Farrukh Siyar 102-109; obtains Viceroyalty of Deccan, desires to govern it through a deputy 110; opposed by Farrukh Siyar, agrees to assume personal charge on certain conditions 111-113; fights and defeats Da'ūd Khan Panni 114; relations with Marathas 129-130, forms pact with Shahu through Shankaraji 131-132; attempt of Farrukh Siyar to check 133-134, 137; marches to Delhi, deposes Farrukh Siyar 139; general policy after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 147-150; differences with 'Abdullah K. over sharing of power 151; his character 139, 152, 158, 165n; his attitude towards old nobles and Nizam-ul-Mulk 152-154, plan of partition of empire 155; attempt to remove Nizam from Malwa 156; plan to assassinate M. Amin Khan 158-159; his plan of action against Nizam 159 160; rejects 'Abdullah Khan's idea of a compromise with Nizam 160; marches to the Deccan, assassinated 161; his policy etc. discussed 163-165.

I

Ibrāhīm Khān, son of 'Alī Mardān Khān, appointed governor of Kabul 243.

Ijārah (revenue-farming) 81, 109, 116, 165, 174.

Ikhlās Khān, 'arṣ-i-mukarrar', 57-58, 126, 141.

'Ināyatullāh Khān, Mīr Munshī of Aurangzīb, xliii, 125-128.

Inder Singh xxxiii, 74; sons assassinated by Ajit Singh 100.

Iqtā', iqtā'dār xiii, xvii.

Irādat Khān, historian, 29n, 64, 67, 78, 79, 81, 131n.

Irānīs (see also Mughals)—position in the nobility xxiii, xxv-xxvi; and Shi'ism xxix; Aurangzīb's attitude towards xxix, 4n, 8-9.

'Isā Khān Main, favourite of Jahāndār Shāh, 88.

Islām Khān, Mīr Ātish, 78n.

I'tiqād Khān (see M. Murād).

I'tisām Khān, diwān-i-khālīshah, 126n.
 'Izz-ud-Daulah Khān-i-Jahān 'Alam-giri 35; appointed governor of Orissa 89n, 92.

J

Jadu Rai, Maratha agent, 202, 237.

Jāgīr, Jāgīrdārī: Character and nature of xiii, xvii-xxii; crisis of jagirdari in 17 Century xl-xliii; attempt at reform by Bahadur Shah 57-59, by Zu'lfiqar K. 80-81, by Inayatullah K. under Farrukh Siyar 127, by Nizam-ul-Mulk 174-175.

Interference of provincial governors etc. with 123, 137-138n, 147, 173, 186, 235; summary 264-265, 267

Jahāngīr 61n, 87, 138.

Jahāndār Shāh (Bahādūr Shāh's son)
 Governor of Multan at the time of Aurangzīb's death 15; succeeds in civil war due to the support of Zu'lfiqar Khan 64-67; relations with Asad and Zu'lfiqar Khan after accession 67-69; personal favourites 69-70; La'l Kunwar, her political influence exaggerated, widens breach between Jahandar and Zu'lfiqar Khan 70-73; high price of grain causes popular discontent 82; financial difficulties and extravagance of 83.

Jahān Shāh, son of Bahādūr Shāh, supports claim of Asad Khan for wizarat 25; joins league against 'Azim-ush-Shan for partition of the Empire 64, 65, 66; early relations with Saiyids 88; his son, M. Shah, succeeds to throne 143, 179.

Jai Singh (Mirza Raja) xxxii, xxxiv.

Jai Singh Sawal, Early career 42; raised to 7000|7000 and appointed governor of Malwa by A'zam Shah 20, 73; deserts A'zam in battle of Jeju 29; deprived of Amber by Bahadur Shah, and replaced by Vijai Singh 30-32; escapes from royal camp, agreement with Rana and Ajit Singh for joint campaign against Mughals, recovers Amber 35; restored to mansab, peace made 36-37; serves against the Sikh Guru, appointed faujdar of Chitrukut, demand for governorship rejected, returns home 38-39.

Raised to 7000|7000 and appointed governor of Malwa by Jahandar Shah 74; asked to help against Farrukh Siyar 84n; submits to Farrukh Siyar, his alliance with Ajit Singh disapproved, raised to 7000|7000, and appointed governor of Malwa 99-100; persuades Ajit Singh to end war with Husain 'Ali 102; wins crushing victory against Marathas in Malwa 121; early relations with Saiyids 121-123; summoned to court by Farrukh Siyar, appointed to lead expedition against Jats 123-124; fails due to secret opposition of Saiyids, difficulties of terrain etc. 124-125; Farrukh Siyar's letter to regarding jizyah 127n; removed from Malwa 133; banished from court at Husain 'Ali's instance, his country ravaged 137-138, 139n, 140; withdraws to Amber, shelters opponents of Saiyids 145, 148; Saiyids try to win him over 148-149; also approached by Nizam-ul-Mulk 154; opposes proposed re-imposition of jizyah by M. Amin K. 169; attempt made through him to enlist Marathas against Nizam 177; second Jat expedition of 178; asked to assist in expedition against Ajit Singh 181; personal friendship with Khan-i-Dauran, appointed governor of Agra and then of Malwa through him 182, 211; ambition of establishing a hegemony upto Narmada 186-187; relations with the Marathas 200-205; appointed governor Malwa (1729), then replaced 204; clash of interests with Sa'adat K. over du'ab 208; warned by M. Khan Bangash regarding Marathas 209; appointed governor of Malwa for third time (1732), agrees to pay chauth 215, 218-221; his policy discussed 222-223; invites Peshwa to Delhi for peace negotiations 224; meets Baji Rao 225, 230; Emperor negotiates with Marathas through him and Khan-i-Dauran 226; Du'ab raid and Jai Singh 230, 232n; final agreement for ceding Malwa and Bundelkhand made through him (1741) 238.

Jaju, battle of, 16-18.

Jagannāth, Maratha sardar, raids Bijapur 47.

Jalāl-ud-Dīn K., nominated diwan of Burhanpur by Farrukh Siyar, 134.

Jān Nisār Khān, nominated governor of Burhanpur by Farrukh Siyar, 133, 134n.

Janoji, nephew of Hanumant, converted to Islam 87.

Jaswant Singh, Maharaja, xxxii, 7, 32.

Jats—Aurangzib's conflict with xxx; Jai Singh's first expedition against 122-125; second expedition 177-178.

Jizyah—Secret treaties signed by sons of Aurangzib for remission of 21n, 23-24; levied by Bahadur Shah 33; gradually falls into disuse 57; abolished by Jahandar at instance of Asad Khan, 74, 85; abolished by Farrukh Siyar in Bihar at instance of Husain 'Ali 93; order confirmed after accession 98; revived at instance of 'Inayatullah Khan, opposed by 'Abdullah Khan 127; abolished again after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 147; 158;; M. Amin Khan's attempt to revive 169; attempt of Nizam-ul-Mulk to revive fails due to general opposition 175, 183.

K

Kām Bakhsh, Muḥammad (Prince), son of Aurangzib, Shahu transferred to his camp xxxviii; in Jinji campaign 3; appointed governor of Haiderabad 6; conflict with A'zam 10-11; deserted by M. Amin Khan 12; Bahadur Shah's offer regarding partitioning of Empire 24, 40-41; defeat and death 42-43; Rajput relations 34n.

Kanhoji Bhonsle, approached for help against Nizam-ul-Mulk, instructed by Shahu to remain neutral 177, 193n, 215.

Kantha Kadam, lieutenant of Dabhade in Gujarat, 197, 198, 206.

Karnal, battle of, 251-253.

Khāfī Khān, historian 14, 23, 33, 57, 58, 60, 70, 117, 148, 157, 160, 180.

Khālīṣāh and zamindārs xiv, used as Court of Wards xiv, 31-32, 124; its frittering away and farming-out 59, 80, 109.

Khān A'zam Khān, son of Sarbuland K., killed in North-West 243.

Khande Rai, agent of Jai Singh, 187.

Khāndū Dābhādē, defeats Mīr Bakhshī of Husain 'Ali, 130.

(Khawājah 'Aṣim) Khān-i-Daurān (Ṣamsām-ud-Daulah). Early career 105-106, 211n; joins Farrukh Siyar in Bihar, attempts to remove suspicion against Husain 'Ali 93, 95; joins with Mir Jumlah in opposing Saiyids 106, 109, 111; appointed deputy of Husain 'Ali, secretly promises not to oppose Saiyids 114; his influence overestimated by English embassy 120; appointed governor of Agra, his policy of peace with Jats 123; alienated due to rise of new royal favourite, advises deposition of Farrukh Siyar 136, 141; retains position after deposition 144; supports 'Abdullah K.'s proposal for compromise with Nizam-ul-Mulk 159.

Remains chief Bakhshi after fall of Saiyids 168; opposes Nizam-ul-Mulk 171; favours conciliation of Ajit Singh and of Rajputs generally 180-182, 206n; leader of a group at the Court, opposes royal favourites 211, 247; his character and general policies 210-211, 210n, 214-215; favours peace with Marathas 221, 222-226; Baji Rao negotiates with Emperor through him 226-228, 240-241; attitude after failure of negotiations 231, 232n, 236; as a patron of Hindustanis 211, 245-246; connives at peculation of subsidy to N. W. tribes 248; minimises Persian danger 249-250; relations with Nizam-ul-Mulk before battle of Karnal 250-251; writes to Rajputs and Marathas for help 250; killed in battle with Nadir Shah 252-253.

Khān-i-Jahān, uncle of S. 'Abdullāh Khān and Husain 'Alī, 125, 135n.

Khān-i-Zamān, son of Mun'im Khān, 26, 32, 54, 78n.

Khaṣṣ K., brother of La'l Kunwar, 72n.

Khūsh-hāl K., brother of La'l Kunwar, 71, 72n.

Khūsh-hāl K., historian 117.

Khushal Singh, adopted son of Shahu, 204.

Khawājah 'Abdullāh, appointed Sadr by Aurangzīb, dies 8.

Khawājah 'Abid, grand-father of Nizām-ul-Mulk, 7, 8.

Khawājah Anwār, brother of Khān-i-Daurān, 105.

Khawājah Hasan Khān-i-Daurān, brother-in-law of Kokaltāsh Khān, raised to 8000/8000 69; appointed atalāq of Prince A'zzud-Dīn 70, 83.

Khawājah Ja'far, a faqīr of Imamite tendencies, brother of Khān-i-Daurān, 105n, 114n, 211n.

Khawājah Khidmatgār, a khawājah sarai, joins Kūkī's gang 171, 213, 214n.

Kokaltāsh Khān, an old favourite of Jahāndār Shāh, resents appointment against Zu'lfiqar K. 69-73, 80, appointed Mir Bakhshi, intrigues against Zu'lfiqar K. 69-73, 80; 136n; responsibility for executions etc. after accession of Jahandar 79; at battle of Agra against Farrukh Siyar 85.

Kūkī Jīū. One of the favourite of Muḥammad Shāh, extent of her influence 120, 171; leads to increase in corruption and bribery 174; her supporters 212-213; opposed by Khan-i-Dauran, fall from power (1732-3) 213-214.

L

La'l Kunwar, mistress and Queen of Jahandar Shah, antecedents 70; accorded regal state, rise of relations causes dissatisfaction among nobles, Jahandar neglects business and decencies of conduct due to her influence 71-72; political influence exaggerated 72; conflict with Nizam-ul-Mulk 77; Rustam 'Ali executed for raising hand against her 79n; Prince A'zz-ud-Din's dislike of 83; fondness for celebrations 83.

Lashkar Khān 2.

Lutfullāh Khān Sādiq, antecedents 103n; appointed diwan of Prince A'zz-ud-Din, deserts to Farrukh Siyar 83; dispute over his appointment as Diwan-i-Khalisah 103-104; helps Saiyids against Farrukh Siyar 111n; give cash salary to lower mansabdars 117.

M

Mahābat Khān, son of Mun'im Khān, 26, 54, 78n.

Māhī-marātīb (fish-standard) 7, 11n.

Mahmūd, son of Mīr Wais, deposes Safawid monarch 243, 244.

Mansabdārs xxi-xxiv (also see under jagirdars).

Marathas, and Aurangzīb xxviii, xxxiii-xxxix, xlii, 258; position of at death of Aurangzib xlii; attempt of A'zam to conciliate 18-20; and Bahadur Shah 44-49; and Jahandar Shah 74-75; and the Saiyids 130-132, 139, 149-150, 159-160, 166, 257, 260; and M. Amin Khan 169; and Nizam-ul-Mulk 129, 170, 172-173, 192-195, 204n, 205n, 215-217, 223, 232-236; and Rajputs 200-208; and Nadir Shah 236-237; and Muhammad Shah 218-232, 238-239; conquest of Malwa and Gujarat by 189-192, 196-199, 238-239.

Maratha wakīls 75, 197n, 198, 202, 205, 201n, 225n, 226, 227, 237.

Marhamat Khān, dismissed qila'dar of Mandu, employed by Nizam-ul-Mulk 154.

Merchants. Obligation of paying tolls xiv, effect of political integration on xiv; weakness of position xxi; act as middle-men for jagirdars xliii; effect of revenue-farming on 117; treatment of 'Abdul Ghafur Bohra 108n, 171.

Mir Jumlah, early career 104-105; upholds principle of personal rule of monarch 106; accused of plotting to destroy old nobility 107; gains great influence with Farrukh Siyar, opposes Saiyids and interferes in administration 106, 107-109; appointed (absentee) governor of Bengal 109-110; struggle with Saiyids, ordered to leave for Bihar 111, 112; returns to Delhi, disgraced by Farrukh Siyar, helped by 'Abdullah K. 118-119; recalled from Lahore 139; appointed Sadr after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 144; part in assassination of Husain 'Ali 161; continues as Sadr 168.

Mir Wais, captures Qandahar 243.

Mitr Sen, proclaims Nekū Siyar at Agra 145, 146.

Mu'azzam, Muḥammad, see under Bahādūr Shāh.

Mubārīz Khān, deputy of Nizām-ul-Mulk in Deccan, repudiates Nizam's agreement for chauth 172; Nizam tries to remove from Deccan 176; appointed Viceroy of Deccan, defeated and killed by Nizam 177; his attempt to get help of Marathas 21, 291, 193.

Mughal (Also see Irani and Turani): Definition of xxv; Mughal nobles allowed to maintain contingent exclusively of Mughals xxiv; not foreigners xxv-xxvi; their arrogant attitude xxvi; averse to sharing power with others 28, 153, 158; role in party politics of the time 244-246, 257-258.

Mughal Khān, son of Nizām-ul-Mulk, sent to Jai Singh 152, 154.

Muḥammad 'Alī K., bakhshi of Jahān Shāh, imprisoned 78n.

Muḥammad Amīn Khān Chīr (I'timādud-Daulah) Ancestry 6, 8; appointed Sadr by Aurangzib 8; petitions for Bakhshi-giri 9; a patron of Turanis 9; ordered to join Kam Bakhsh 11; abandons him and joins A'zam 12; summoned to the court by Bahadur Shah after accession 24; given rank of 5000 and faujdari of Moradabad 27; remains in background due to alleged ill-will of Mun'im Khan 28; ordered to march against Rajputs 35; marches against Banda 51, 52; leaves his post to take part in civil war at Lahore 53; appointed against Banda again by Zu'lfiqar Khan 75, 76; remains neutral in battle against Farrukh Siyar 78, 80, 84, 105.

Appointed 2nd Bakhshi and given high rank by Saiyid Brothers 97, 98; bid to displace Saiyids from position 111, 113, 114; forms a powerful group in opposition to 'Abdullah Khan 115; attempt of Farrukh Siyar to win him over 116; attitude of Saiyids 128; posted to Malwa to check Husain 'Ali 133, 200; negotiates with Jai Singh 133; rumour of his invading the Deccan, precautions of Husain 'Ali 134; leaves Malwa and returns to the court 136; dismissed from mansab etc. by Farrukh Siyar, won over by 'Abdullah Khan 138; advises deposition of Farrukh Siyar 141; remains 2nd Bakhshi after the deposition 144; clash of interests with the Saiyids 151; warns Nizam-ul-Mulk against Saiyids 157; Husain 'Ali's scheme to assassinate him opposed by 'Abdullah Khan 158; idea abandoned 159; offers to negotiate with Nizam-ul-Mulk on behalf of Saiyids 160; his part in the assassination of Husain 'Ali 161; fights 'Abdullah Khan 162; assessment of his role in relation to the Saiyids 162, 164.

Appointed wazir by M. Shah, his powers and position 168; his general policy as wazir 169, 183; fails in attempt to revive jizyah

- 169; removes Ajit Singh from Gujarat 170; dies 170.
- Muhammad Ghaus Mufti, sent to re-establish Islam in Jodhpur, 32.
- Muhammad Khān Bangash. Antecedents and early life 209; joins battle against 'Abdullah Khan 161, 162; establishes an Afghan center at Farrukhabad 187; invades Bundelkhand (in 1728) 207; besieged at Jaitpur by Baji Rao and forced to relinquish all his conquests in Bundelkhand 199; jealousy of Sa'adat Khan for him 208; his policy and ambitions 209; attitude of Muhammad Shah and Khan-i-Dauran towards 215; appointed governor of Malwa 205; agrees to pay chauth for Malwa 217; replaced by Jai Singh 218; fights Marathas in du'ab 224, 231; approached by Baji Rao with proposal for building a united front against foreign invaders 237.
- Muhammad Murād Kāshmirī, a favourite of Farrukh Siyar, antecedents and early life 136; his rise alienates Khan-i-Dauran and others 136; his mansab and property confiscated after the deposition of Farrukh Siyar 144; sides with 'Abdullah Khan in battle against Muhammad Shah 162.
- Muhammad Shāh. Accession 143; his position during the Saiyid hegemony 165n; secret appeals to Nizam-ul-Mulk against Saiyids 157; proceeds to Deccan with Husain 'Ali, after assassination of Husain 'Ali fights and defeats 'Abdullah K. 161-162; his position during the Wizarat of M. Amin Khan 168; character, neglects government, ruled by favourites 121, 171, 212, 213, 215; attitude to Nizam-ul-Mulk 175; rejects his proposals 176; Jat and Rajput affairs under 177-184; Maratha affairs 196-239; and Nadir Shah 247-254.
- Muhammad Sultān, son of Aurangzib, 10n.
- Mukham Singh, son of Churaman Jat, 178.
- Mukham Singh, son of Inder Singh, assassinated 100.
- Mukham Singh, Wāqa'-Nigār Kul under Bahādur Shāh 99; diwan of Husain 'Ali in the Deccan 130; at the battle of Hasanpur 161n.
- Mungi Shivgaon, battle of, 195.
- Mun'im Khān (Khān-i-Khanan) early career 15; his part in success of Bahadur Shah in the War of Succession 16, appointed wazir 26; resentment of Asad and Zu'lfiqar Khan, and their rivalry with him 25-27, 28; attitude towards old nobles 24n, 26-27, 29; favours cautious compromise—Rajput policy 34, 35, 38; opposes grant of wide powers to Zu'lfiqar Khan in the Deccan 44; presents petition of Tara Bai for sardeshmukhi 45; blamed for escape of Banda 52; death 53; controversy between his sons and Zu'lfiqar Khan for wizarat 53-54; his administration 57-59; Sufi inclinations 29, 56; relations as wazir with Bahadur Shah 62-63.
- Muqti'*—see iqū'dār.
- Murshid Qulī Khān, governor of Bengal, 44n. 92, 185.
- Mu'tamad Khān, appointed diwan-i-Khalīṣah 104.
- Muzaffar Khān, brother of Khān-i-Daurān, 105n, 221n; appointed governor of Ajmer 179, 180; quarrels with Sa'adat K. 185, 245n; killed 253.

N

Nādir Shāh: Maratha attitude to 236-237; rise of 244; envoys to Mughal Court 247-248; was he invited by the Mughals? 249; begins invasion of India 250-251; battle of Karnal 251-253; occupation of Delhi 254; impact on Indian politics and society 255-256.

Nāhar Khān, nā'ib of Ajit Singh in Gujarat 170n; murdered by Ajit Singh 181.

Najābat 'Alī Khān 32, 225n.

Najm-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, Saiyid, brother of S. 'Abdullah K., 92, 96, 144n.

Nāmdār Khān, brother of La'l Kunwar, 72n.

Nāṣir Jung, son of Nizām-ul-Mulk, 238n.

Nāṣir Khān I, governor of Kabul 242, 243.

Nāṣir Khān II, governor of Kabul 243, 248.

Nekū Siyar, proclaimed Emperor at Agra 145, 146, 155.

Netaji, xxxiv.

Nīlkanth Nāgar, deputy of Sa'adat K. 178.

Nīmājī Sindhia, Maratha sardar 7, 46n, 87, joins Mughals 44, 87, 130.

Nīsār Khān, son-in-law of Qamar-ud-Din K., 220.

Nizām-ul-Mulk (see under Chīn Qulīch Khān for early life). Given title of Nizām-ul-Mulk, and appointed Viceroy of Deccan with wide powers by Saiyids 97; Abdullah Khan's regard for 97; his powers in the Deccan—sends back the diwan 107n; replaced in Deccan by Husain 'Alī, joins Farrukh Siyar against Saiyids 110, 114, 115; summoned from Moradabad by Farrukh Siyar 134; alienated due to removal from faujdarī of Moradabad 136; 138; remains neutral during deposition of Farrukh Siyar, Saiyid suspicion of and attempt to conciliate 145, 150, 151; appointed governor of Malwa, but mutual ill-will continues 152-153; approaches Jai Singh for joint action against Saiyids 149; revolt against the Saiyids, causes and issues involved 154-166. Retains charge of Deccan—first meeting with Baji Rao, confirms grant of chauth and sardeshmukhi 168, 169; appointed wazir, his difficulties at the court 170-172; campaign against Haider Quli, meets Baji Rao again, his general policies 172-174; scheme for reforms and for reimposition of jizyah rejected, leaves for Deccan 174-177, 183; defeats Mubariz Khan 177; 182; relations with Marathas upto 1728, treaty of Mungi Shivgaon 192-195; relations with Khan-i-Dauran and Delhi Court 206, 214, 215, 216, 217; secret treaty giving Baji Rao free hand in North India 216; accused by Jai Singh of helping Marathas 221n; alliance of Sa'adat Khan with, concern at negotiations of Baji Rao and Emperor 222, 223, 228n arrival at the Court, battle of Bhopal 232-236; did he invite Nadir Shah? 249; sends back army to Deccan from Bhopal, summons Sa'adat K. 250; takes no part in battle of Karnal 252; imprisoned by Nadir Shah 253; acts as tax-collector for Nadir Shah 254; discredited in the eyes of Emperor 255, 238; his role in party politics 257, 260-261, 262.

Nobility (see also jāgīrdārs). Character, composition and organisation xxi-xxix; growth of features of a bureaucracy, but remain essentially an elite ruling group xxii-xxiii; position of ethnic and regional groups in during 17th century xxiii-xxix; effect of political stresses and crisis of jagirdari on xii, xliii.

Groups towards end of Aurangzib's reign 1-10; groups at Bahadur Shah's court, and their policies 25-29, 44-45; groups at Jahandar's court, dissatisfaction of old nobles 67-73, 77-78; parties under Farrukh Siyar, destruction of many old families, attempt of Saiyids to ally with old nobles and Hindus 104-109, 111-115, 128-129, 144; failure of Saiyid attempt to ally with old nobles 150-158, 165-166; 'Peace' and 'War' parties at the Court, their attitude to Marathas and to Nizam-ul-Mulk 210-217, 222-232; effect of ethnic groups on party politics 244-249; role of nobility in disintegration of empire 257-262.

Nūr Jahān 72, 73n.

Nūr-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, Saiyid, killed at Jājū 88.

Nūrullāh Khān, joins Nizām 157.

Nuṣrat Yār K., Bārāha 146n; fights Abdullah K. 161n; appointed governor of Ajmer 180.

P

Paimā Rāj Sindhia, joins Mughals 48.

Parsoji Bhonsle, conquests of 155.

Pawār (Yashwantrao) in Malwa 219, 234n.

Pidiā Nāyak, escapes from Wakin-dhara 4.

Pilājī Gaekwar, in Gujarat 197, 206, 207, 219, 223, 228.

Pijājī Jādhav, fights Qamar-ud-Dīn 221, 240.

Pratinidhi (Shrīpat Rao) dispute with Baji Rao 190-191; Nizam's alliance with 194, 197, 203, 216.

Q

Qudratullāh Shaikh, favourite of 'Azīm-ush-Shān, 64; executed 107n.

Qutb-ul-Mulk, see 'Abdullāh Khān.

Qamar-ud-Dīn Khān, son of M. Amīn Khān, made Daroghah of the ahadis 98; granted the rank of 7000 and faujdari of Moradabad after the fall of Saiyids 168; offered subahdari of Ajmer shrinks from cost and the difficulty of campaign against Ajit Singh 180; Haidar Quli Khan appointed governor of Ajmer at his instance 181; as Wazir of M. Shah—his character and policy 209, 210; joined by Abhai Singh 207; his campaigns against the Marathas 219; deals with rebellion of Adaru 220, 221; leader of "War" party at the court, tussle with Khan-i-Dauran and Ajit Singh 222-224; opposes peace negotiations with Baji Rao 226, leads campaign against Marathas in 1737 231; as a patron of Mughals 245-246; forfeits confidence of M. Shah due to role in battle of Karnal 255; character of his group 257.

Qāzī Qāzī Khān, sent to re-establish Islam in Jodhpur, 32.

R

Rafī-ud-Daulah, raised to throne by Saiyids 141.

Rafī-ud-Darjāt, raised to throne after deposition of Farrukh Siyar 141, 143.

Rafī-ush-Shān, son of Bahādūr Shān, fights war of succession at Lahore 64, 65.

Raghuji Bhonsle, does not cooperate with Bajī Rao, 237.

Rāhūrī xivn, 123, 131.

Rahīm-ud-Dīn K., half brother of Nizām-ul-Mulk 8, 9n.

Rai Rāyān, resigns post of diwan-i-khalisah 126n.

Rājārām xxxviii, 3, 4.

Rāṭārām Jat 122.

Rajputs, and Akbar xxiv; and man-sabdari xxiv, and tribalism xxviii; and Jats xxx; Aurangzīb's relations with xxxii-xxxiii; attempt of A'zam to conciliate 20-21; and Bahadur Shah, cautious conciliation 29-39, 260; large concessions under Jahandar Shah 74; and Farrukh Siyar, war against Ajit Singh 99-102; and Saiyids 147-149, 166, 257, 260; and M. Shah 178-182; desire for aggrandizement after departure of Nizam-ul-Mulk, 186-187; and Maratha expansionism 200-208, 220-221, 262; at battle of Bhopal 234; appeal to for help against Nadir Shah 250

Rāj Singh, restored to Rupnagar, 74. (Rao) Rambhā Nimbālkar, joins Mughals 48, 75n; sides with Nizam in rebellion 157n.

(Rao) Rām Singh Hārā, lieutenant of Zu'lfiqar K., 5, 6n, 12, killed at Jaju 18.

Rana of Mewār xxxix, 23, 30, 32.

Ratan Chand, diwan of 'Abdullāh Khān, antecedents 108n; 'Abdullah Khan, leaves all affairs in his hands, opposed by Mir Jumlah and Farrukh Siyar for bribery and revenue farming 108-109; continues these practices, influences even appointment of qazis, accused of neglecting old nobles 116-117; attempt of 'Inayatullah to reduce his authority 127; opposes re-imposition of jizyah etc. 127; Girdhar Bahadur submits to Saiyids through him 147; brings about agreement between 'Abdullah K. and Husain 'Ali 151; supports 'Abdullah Khan's proposal for compromise with Nizam 159; supports Haider Quli 171; blamed for unpopularity of Saiyids 158n, 165, 265.

Riā'yāt Khān, captures Rohtas fort, 90.

Roshan-ud-Daulah Zafar Khān Pānī-patī, a Turani, appointed 3rd Bakhshi by Saiyids 144; sides with Kuki 213, 214n; supports "war" party 222, 226; in shoe-sellers' riot 245, 246; downfall 247.

Rustam Dil Khān at Jājū 17; fights Sikhs 42n, 52, 53.

Rustam Khān Bījāpūrī, punished for failure against Marathas 47, 48.

S

Sa'adat Khān (Burhān-ul-Mulk) joins in plot against Husain 'Ali 161; appointed Governor of Awadh 168; harried by Jats in march against Ajit Singh 177; his deputy in Agra, Nilkanth, defeated and killed by Jats 178; takes possession of jagirs in Awadh, defies imperial orders transferring him from Awadh 185; clash of interests with Jai Singh and M. Khan Bangash regarding du'ab, advocates resistance to Marathas 208; joins Khan-i-Dauran in intrigues against royal favourites 214; tries to enlist Baji Rao against Nizam 217, 229n; opposes Maratha policy of Khan-i-Dauran and Jai Singh 222-224, 226; fights Baji Rao in du'ab 231; Emperor's annoyance, sent to his province 232; helps Nizam at battle of Bhopal 234; a patron of Iranis 245; suspected of inviting Nadir Shah 249; summoned for help by Nizam 250; at battle of Karnal 251-253; acts as tax-collector 254; dies 255.

Sa'adat Khān, relation of Farrukh Siyar, 144.

Sabha Chand, dīwān of Zu'lfiqār K., 68, 72.

Sa'd-ud-Dīn Khān, Khān-i-Samān, 170n.

Sa'dullāh Khān (Hidāyatullāh Khān) diwan-i-tan-o-khalisah under Bahadur Shah 53, 54, 57; opposes Zu'lfiqār K. 69; executed by Farrukh Siyar 107n, 126.

Safdar Jang, reinforces Nizām-ul-Mulk at Bhopal, 234.

Saif Khān 34n.

Salābat Khān, Saiyid, appointed Mir Atish 145n.

Šamšām-ud-Daulah, see Khān-i-Daurān.

Santaji Sawai, deputed to meet Jai Singh for campaign against Nizam, 215.

Santoji Bhonsle, joins Husain 'Ali on behalf of Shahu 132.

Sarbuland Khān (Mubārīz-ul-Mulk) antecedents 136n, appointed governor of Gujarat 70; replaces Mir Jumlah as governor of Bihar 118; his stern dealing with zamindars 135n; summoned by Farrukh Siyar for ousting Saiyids 134; removed from Bihar, appointed to Kabul at 'Abdullah's instance 136; neutral in deposition of Farrukh Siyar 138, 164; son, A'zam K., killed by tribesmen while returning from Kabul to Peshawar 243; as Governor of Gujarat, concludes pact, for chauth with Baji Rao 197; removed from Gujarat, attempts independence 186n; 197, 202n, 206, 215, 222n; supports "War" party at

- Delhi 222; acts as tax-collector for Nadir Shah in Delhi 253.
- Sardeshmukhi* origin xxxv; Shivaji's demand for xxxv; and Tara Bai xxxvii; Aurangzib's willingness to concede xxviii-xxixn; conceded by A'zam, 18-20; granted by Bahadur Shah to Tara Bai and Shahu 45; Da'ud Khan's pact for 48, 49, Husain 'Ali's pact for 131-132; confirmed 149.
- Sardeshpande*, post of 227, 229, 233.
- Satnamis xxx-xxx1.
- Senapati (see Dabhade).
- Shāh 'Alam—see under Bahādūr Shāh.
- Shāh 'Alī Khan Bārāha, Saiyid, appointed governor of Allahabad 145n, 146.
- Shāh Jahān xli. 16, 61-62, 65, 95n, 213n.
- Shahji Bhonsle, xxxiii, xxxivn, 221.
- Shāh Tahmāsp Safavī, Nizam's desire to restore 174, 244; abdicates 247.
- Shāh Waliullāh, Muslim divine, 261.
- Shāhū, granted mansab of 7000, attitude of Aurangzib to as a prisoner xxxvi, xxxviii; Zu'lfiqar Khan's personal interest in 5, 6; allowed to escape 18-20; Bahadur Shah's refusal to grant chauth to and to recognize as Maratha King 45-46; creates disturbance in Deccan 46-48; private pact with Da'ud Khan Panni for chauth and sardeshmukhi of Deccan 48-49; struggle with Tara Bai 75; Da'ud Khan's pact revoked by Nizam-ul-Mulk, renewed hostilities with the Mughals 130; urged by Farrukh Siyar to oppose Husain 'Ali 130; pact with Husain 'Ali 131-132; his family sent from Delhi by Husain 'Ali after Farrukh Siyar's deposition 149; cordial relations with Husain 'Ali, demand for chauth of Gujarat and Malwa 155, 166, 196; requested by Saiyids to assist 'Alam Ali against Nizam-ul-Mulk 159, 160n; Nizam-ul-Mulk's agreement with for chauth and sardeshmukhi 169n, 173; Nizam's deputy, Mubariz K. repudiates pact 122; approached by Muhammad Shah to helping Mubariz Khan against Nizam-ul-Mulk 177; division of revenues between him and sardars 188-189; appoints Baji Rao as Peshwa 189; Karnatak expeditions and Shambhaji xxxl 195n; assigns chauth of Gujarat to Pratinidhi, contested by Baji Rao 197; patches up agreement between them 198; Girdhar Bahadur disregards his representation regarding Malwa 199; Jai Singh's proposal for settlement with 204-205, 262; favours moderation in dealing with the Mughals 203; attitude towards Nizam-ul-Mulk 215; gradually edged out of power by Baji Rao 227n; instructs Baji Rao to aid the Emperor against Nadir Shah 237; attitude towards Baji Rao's proposal for building a united front against future invasion from North 238.
- Saif-ud-Dīn 'Alī Khān, Saiyid, brother of S. 'Abdullah K. 145n, 161n, 215.
- Shankarāji Malhar, adviser of Saiyids in the Deccan 131, 149, 150, 226.
- Sharf-ud-Daulah 181.
- Shaikh Ahmad Sirhindī, xxxi.
- Shā'istah Khān, relation of Farrukh Siyar, property confiscated 144; sheltered by Jai Singh 146.
- Sher Afkan Khān, brother of Roshan-ud-Daulah 213n, 246.
- Shiv Singh, son of Dhir, zamindar 135n.
- Shambhaji, son of Shivaji, appointed to mansab of 5000, xxxiv, raised to 6000 xxxv, then to 7000 xxxvi, captured and executed xxxvi.
- Shambhaji, Kolhapur Raja, 195.
- Shī'ism* Aurangzib's dislike of xxix, Shī'ism and Iranis xxix, 9; and A'zam 13; and Bahadur Shah 22, 56; in the time of Farrukh Siyar 105.
- Shivaji rise xxiii; treaty of Purandar with Jai Singh xxxiv; subsequent relations with Mughals xxxiv-xxxvi; claim for chauth of Malwa and Gujarat 196.

Shivaji II, son of Rājārām 45, 74.
 Shujā'at Khān Bārāha, Saiyid, displaced from Ajmer 35, 36n, 89.
 Shujā' Khān, recognised as governor of Bengal 185.
 Siddhishta Nārāyan, zamindar of Bhojpur 93.
 Sidi of Janjira 190, 237.
 Sīdī Qāsim, the kotwāl 107.
 Sikhs—clash with Aurangzīb xxxi-xxxii, with Bahadur Shah and his successors 50-53.
Sipah Sālār, post of 7, 11n, 13.
 Šūfī Bāyazīd of Burdhan, hails Farrukh Siyar as king 90n.
 Sultān Husain Safwī, defeated and deposed by Mahmūd 243.
 Sultanji Nimbalkar, deputed to help Jai Singh against Nizām 215.
 Surman, John, English factor 120, 126n.
Swarajya (of Shivaji) xxxviii, 19, 131-132.

T

Tāhir Khān—governor of Asirgarh, joins Nizām 157.
 Taqarrub Khān, executed by Kām Bakhsh 42.
 Taqarrub Khān, a personal follower of Farrukh Siyar 97n, sheltered by Jai Singh 146.
 Tārā Bāi, widow of Rajaram xxxvii, 45, 75, 155.
 Tarbiyat Khān, Mīr Ātish 12.
 Thakurs (see zamindars).
 Tulsi Bai 49.
 Tūrānis (see under Mughals).

U

Udāji Pawār, lieutenant of Baji Rao, 198, 216.
 Umabai Dabhade 198.

V

Vijai Singh, brother of Jai Singh, appointed to Amber in place of Jai Singh 29, 30, 31; his later life 31n.

W

Wazīr Khān, faujdar of Sirhind 36, 50.
Wizarat evolution under successors of Akbar, military aspect emphasised 61-62, position of Mun'im Khan as wazir 61-62, Zu'lfiqar Khan's concept of wizarat, significance of his wizarat 55, 65, 67-73, 85; Saiyid concept of "new" wizarat 95, 96; not accepted by Emperor and his favourites 102-104, 106; "new" wizarat becomes identified with liberal politics 123, 127-129; significance of Saiyid wizarat 162-167; Saiyid concepts and M. Amin Khan and Nizam-ul-Mulk 176-177, 182-184, general summary 257-261.

Y

Yādgar Khān, negotiates with Baji Rao on Emperor's behalf 227, 228n, 229n.
 Yār M. Khān, nawab of Bhopal, 229.

Z

Zafar Khān, brother of Kokaltāsh K., 69n.
 Zafar Khān Panipatī see Roshan-ud-Daulah.
 Zakariyah Khān, son of 'Abduš Šamad Khān, 168, 185, 251, 263.
Zamindars—Their position compared to iqta'dars and jagirdars xiii, xviii-xviii; relations with Sultans of Delhi and Mughal Emperors: tolerated, but attempts made to reduce their power xiii-xvi; promote regional sentiments xvii; position of petty-assignees (holders of waqf, ir'am, milk, maddad-i-mu'ash) in relation to xx; admitted to mansabs in limited number by Akbar xv, xxiii; Rajput zamindars and Akbar xxiv; support oppositional movements xxxi; zamindars and khalisah xlv.
 Conflict of governors with zamindars in Bihar 93, 118, 135n, 152; in Awadh and Allahabad 134-135n,

- 208; in Karnatak 49, 131; in Narnol 180; general growth in power of 165, 187, 220.
- Zinat-un-Nisā Begum 27.
- Ziya-ud-Dīn Khān, appointed Diwan of Deccan by Farrukh Siyar, Husain 'Alī's treatment of 134.
- Zuhrah, a friend of La'l Kunwar, her influence in time of Muhammad Shah 71, 77.
- Zu'lfiqār 'Alī Khān, Mīr Bakhs̄hī of Husain 'Alī killed 130.
- Zu'lfiqār Khān (Itiqād Khān) antecedents and early career xxxvii, xxxix, 2-5, 88; his supporters, character of group, its power and influence 5-6, 8, 9, 10; relations with A'zam 11-13; flees from Jaju 17-18n; Shahu escapes at his instance, concessions to Rajput Rajas 18-21.
- Summoned by Bahadur Shah, appointed Mīr Bakhs̄hī 24, 25; appointed deputy to his father 27; conflict for power and regarding policies with Mun'im K. 26, 28, 35, 43, 46; appointed (absentee) Viceroy of the Deccan with wide powers 43-44; jagirs looted by Marathas 47; pact for chauth made by his deputy 28; alienated from 'Azim-ush-Shan, organises other princes against him 53-55, 64-66; Jahandar succeeds with his support, power and position as his wazīr 67-68; opposition of royal favourites and La'l Kunwar 68-73, attitude towards Rajputs, Marathas etc. and Hindus 73-76; relations with M. Amin K. and Chin Qulich 76-77; fails to rally old nobility 78, 81; charge of oppression and miserliness 78-79; his administration 80-81, 260, 265; leaves affairs in hands of subordinates 81-82, 126n; defeated by Saiyids, and executed 82-84, 96-97, 99, 106-107; significance of his wizarat 85, 103, 110, 182-183, 257.
- Zu'lfiqār Khān Qarāmāulū, father of Asad Khān, 1.

